PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 5, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, as we come together this morning to open another session of the Senate our hearts are saddened with the news of the passing of one of the eminent statesmen of this great country. We think of his career, in which Thou didst lead him on. Through all the tract of the years he wore the white flower of a stainless life. He presided with dignity and with justice in this place. He gave his life to the highest interests of his country.

We pray that as Thou dost call us day by day to face the solemn responsibilities of life, in view of the passing of so many, our hearts may be chastened and refined that we may have a regard for the final issue.

We pray now Thy blessing, O God, upon our land and country. Still raise up men able to lead us onward along the lines of the higher ideals of our fathers and give us the final victory. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, June 3, 1918, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEATH OF HON. CHARLES WARREN FAIRBANKS.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, as one of the representatives from Indiana in this body, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the Senate the death at his home in Indianapolis last evening of the Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks, for eight years a Member of this body and for four years its presiding officer. In accordance with the precedents I shall introduce a resolution providing that the Senate adjourn as a mark of respect for the character and the services of this eminent statesman.

Senator Fairbanks was a well-rounded and symmetrical man. He had that indefinable trait that we call poise. He was well balanced. He was a student by inclination. The very bent of his genius early led him into the law and then into politics, a path that has been so frequently trod by many men who have become conspicuous in the history of the Republic.

Mr. President, Senator Fairbanks became a Member of this body on the 4th of March, 1897, and until his elevation to the Vice Presidency he served his State and his country with peculiar fidelity and with signal ability.

In debate he was argumentative but never abusive, for he conducted all of his battles on the high plane of principle. Members heard him gladly, for they knew that he had investigated every phase of the question under discussion and that he would give to them the results of his honest thought. All men believed him to be sincere. His very bearing forbade the thought of subterfuge. He was an indefatigable worker, and therefore he came full armed to the discussion of every problem he chose to debate.

As presiding officer of the Senate, those who were Members of this body during his incumbency will attest the statement that he presided with fairness and impartiality; that he was ever courteous and urbane; and that he never sought to take any partisan advantage of his position. His conduct at all times was marked by a dignity rarely seen, and his very presence impressed all those who met him with the nobility of his character.

Senator Fairbanks was the most eminent citizen of my State in private life, and his death will be universally mourned by the people of that Commonwealth, who everywhere respected and admired him for his worth as a man, his work as a citizen, and his services as a statesman.

He was known to all of them as a man of spotless reputation and unblemished character, and he was held in this esteem by men of all parties, notwithstanding his leadership in many bitter campaigns.

They all regarded him as their friend, just as all knew him to possess those qualities they could trust. They never doubted him in either private or public life, for they knew the solid granite of his character. His fame will go down to a far day among them as one who bore well the burdens of life, who was a loving father, who was a respected citizen, who won the admiration of all with whom he came in contact because of those enduring traits of character that made the man.

Mr. President, inasmuch as he is not a Member of this body extended remarks would not be in order, and therefore I content myself by offering the following resolutions:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Indiana.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 257), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks, a former Member of this body from the State of Indiana, later Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the illustrious dead the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I think sorrow and sadness was brought to every Member of this body when it was announced last night that Vice President Fairbanks had passed away. I believe I hazard nothing in saying the Senate has never had a presiding officer who discharged the duties of his position with more ability, fidelity, and fairness than they were discharged by Vice President Fairbanks. He not only commanded the confidence and esteem but the affectionate regard of every Senator who served in this body with him, and I may say of every Senator, and, indeed, of all who ever knew him before or after his service in this body.

I am very sure, Mr. President, there is not a Member of the Senate who would be willing to proceed with the business of the Senate until we paid by an adjournment the highest tribute it is in our power at this time to pay to Vice President Fairbanks.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 6, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 5, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, though our faith in human nature has been strained to well-nigh the breaking through the barbarous methods of warfare introduced by the Germans and their allies, with a view of terrorizing the world and destroying human rights, help us to realize that it is through a false and vicious education, systematically followed up for more than a half century in their homes, their schools, and from their pulpits, which is opposed to the gospel message, the thunderings of Sinai, the prophets and seers of old, and is therefore unnatural, inhuman, expressed in the indignation of all civilized peoples.

Help us, therefore, to stand fast to our convictions, and, though faith may long be delayed, it will vindicate itself in the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, who lives and reigns in the hearts of all true men, in Jesus Christ the expressed image of the Father.

O Love, O Life, our faith and sight
Thy presence maketh one;
As through transfigured clouds of white
We trace the noonday sun.

So, to our mortal eyes subdued,
Flesh-veiled, but not concealed,
We know in Thee the fatherhood
And heart of God revealed.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LANGLEY and Mr. RANDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes, but before that the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, Gen. HOLLINGSWORTH, of Ohio, who is delayed at his home, delivered a patriotic address on Memorial Day, which I think is a very remarkable one, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a patriotic speech made by Gen. HOLLINGSWORTH, of Ohio, on Memorial Day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] is recognized for three minutes.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, was consent granted to the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is rather inclined to think it was, but I will put the question over again. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I rather think that consent was not granted. I reserve the right to object, with the view of finding out what subject the gentleman intends to speak about. He has a bottle in his hand. What he intends to do with it I do not know.

Mr. RANDALL. I intend to speak concerning an item that appeared in the Washington Times of last night about finding beer bottles in the House Office Building.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that is a peculiar circumstance?

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I propose to elucidate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask the gentleman if he intends to propose any action, because if the article to which he refers is unfair in reflecting upon the great body of the Representatives of the people, to continue that sort of discussion may not be wise.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I propose to show by evidence on this bottle that the finding of this bottle in the House Office Building is simply a "plant" made by some one. I will prove it by the statement on the bottle.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is in this position, that if he suspects a plant in the House Office Building, which might apply as well to any other branch of the Capitol, it would be possible for certain designing men, having photographers along, to place a barrel of empty whisky bottles before the door of the gentleman from California, who is a confirmed prohibitionist, and it might affect the gentleman's chances for reelection in California.

Mr. RANDALL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the whole thing is disgraceful and disgusting and is not entitled to attention. The only reason I ask for these few minutes in which to say something about it is because the Washington Times has been making it appear, or attempting to make it appear, that I am cooperating with that paper in trying to discover empty whisky bottles and beer bottles in the House Office Building.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no objection to the gentleman proceeding; but I will say this, that the gentleman is just as likely to be made a victim of a plant of whisky and beer bottles put before his door as anybody else in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman think he needs any defense in the House of Representatives as to what the Washington Times says?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

The SPEAKER. I wish everybody would speak loud enough to be heard.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he is indifferent to the conditions to which the Times has called attention?

Mr. GARNER. I am, so far as I am individually concerned, entirely indifferent to it, because I do not think it is any business of the Times or of anybody else as to what gentlemen do when they do not violate the law.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the gentleman from California proceeding for three minutes?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question. Does the gentleman from California feel that he is under a ban and has to clear his motive?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. No; the regular order has been demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Go ahead. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears none.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in the late edition of the brewers' journal of last night, otherwise known as the Washington Times [laughter], this item appears:

A Times reporter discovers 38 empty whisky bottles in a box in the House Office Building—Congressman RANDALL and a Times reporter find 26 empty beer bottles in a storeroom on the fifth floor of the building.

Mr. Speaker, the Times reporter came to my office yesterday morning and said he had heard of some more bottles in the House Office Building, and wanted to know if I would go up and help him discover them. I said, "No; I am not interested." He continued to talk for a while, and then went over to my telephone and called up some one and got information as to where these bottles were, and said, "I have just found out where they are. If you want to see them, will you go up?" I said, "All right." We went up to the attic and he looked along the hall for a while—more in the air than anywhere else—and then finally said, "Here they are," and stepped behind a pile of mail sacks, where there was a box of beer bottles tied up with a string, and covered so that they could not be discovered unless he had known where they were. He pulled out the box, which was a paper carton, and opened it, untied the fresh string that was around it, and pulled out 26 beer bottles. This is one of the bottles [exhibiting].

Mr. DYER. What brand is it? [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. In that attic when anything lies up there a few months it is covered with dust. This box, with the string around it, was freshly placed there. I examined the bottles carefully, and I found on the labels, which is the Faust brand of beer, the notorious brand of St. Louis, "Alcohol, 4½ per cent."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States issued an order on December 8, 1917, reducing the alcoholic content of beer to 2¾ per cent, and a bottle in the House Office Building, in a box freshly placed there containing bottles labeled "Alcohol, 4½ per cent," evidently was bought of some junk shop and placed there very recently in order to bolster up this cheap slander which the Washington Times is conducting against the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

ALIEN SLACKERS.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under the call of the President 1,000,000 of our young men are to-day registering for military service. It is an appropriate moment perhaps to call attention to the Nation's progress, or rather utter lack of progress, in solving the alien-slacker problem. In spite of the extreme gravity and importance of the question not one thing has been done. We have been in a state of coma, which has apparently been growing more and more acute and hopeless as the months have passed.

Let me review very briefly the chronology:

1. The draft law was signed by the President May 18, 1917.

2. Ten million men between 21 and 31 registered June 5. As I pointed out in a rather extended speech delivered in this House on July 13, over one-eighth of the number, about a million and a quarter in all, were aliens and exempt from the draft. In some States the percentage of alien registrants to total registrants was 35 or 40 per cent. Yet the quotas of these States were based on total population, although one-third or more of that population was exempted outright. The unfair and unjust drain upon the citizen population of these communities was manifest. The spectacle of the young alien stepping into the job of the drafted American was not an agreeable one. But running still deeper was the conviction of our people that the alien who had come to our shores, obtaining our protection and enjoying our freedom and prosperity, must not escape without the slightest obligation to defend the United States in its struggle for existence.

3. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs on August 1 unanimously reported out a resolution which I had introduced and which had the express sanction of the President and the Secretary of State. This resolution called upon the Secretary of State to enter into treaties for the inclusion in our draft of the subjects of foreign countries residing in this country.

4. On August 1 the Senate unanimously passed a practically identical resolution.

5. On September 12 the Senate passed the drastic Chamberlain bill, providing for the draft of all aliens except enemy aliens and aliens protected by treaty. This resolution, upon the personal request of the Secretary of State, was killed later in September by the House Committee on Military Affairs and has never been resurrected.

6. On February 27, after repeated postponements requested by the Secretary of State, the House passed the Burnett bill, providing deportation for the aliens who did not submit to the draft. This bill apparently is as dead as the Chamberlain bill, no action having been taken by the Senate.

7. Presumably pursuant to the action of Congress of last August the Secretary of State on February 27 finally submitted to the Senate drafts of treaties with Great Britain and Canada for the mutual drafting of the subjects of each country residing in the other. On March 22, two and one-half months ago, the Secretary withdrew the treaties. They have not been resubmitted.

Here the story stops. Fourteen months after the declaration of war and 13 months after the enactment of the draft law nothing has been done in spite of the warranted and insistent demand of the whole country for speedy action. Millions of our men are going forth to the war, yet no alien need accompany them to defend their common country.

"How long?" Is there no end to the delay? Can it be that we can not agree with those allies by whose side we are fighting for our lives? Surely the cordial feelings between us must make possible an immediate meeting of minds. Surely each nation will gladly yield in matters of detail. Surely the nations must not in this regard appear as bargainers, each seeking its utmost advantage. The common cause is far too great to be belittled by any such attitude. Let us get together in this as in all else.

CHARLES WARREN FAIRBANKS.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, we have all heard with the deepest sorrow of the death last night of Hon. Charles Warren Fairbanks at his home in Indianapolis, Ind.

For many years Mr. Fairbanks has been prominently identified with public affairs, not only of the State but of the Nation. Twice elected to represent the State of Indiana in the Senate of the United States, resigning from that position when elected as Vice President of the United States, he has filled every position with honor and credit, not only to himself but to his country. Indiana will ever hold in loving remembrance the high character and the unblemished record of Charles Warren Fairbanks.

My colleague, Mr. WOOD, has been more intimately associated with Mr. Fairbanks than any other member of the Indiana delegation, and I ask unanimous consent that he may be given 10 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I wish to thank my colleague, Mr. DIXON, for making this request and the House for granting it.

Announcement is made this morning through the public press of the death of Charles Warren Fairbanks, of Indiana. While Mr. Fairbanks was never a Member of this body, he served for eight years as a Member of the Senate, and was Vice President of the United States for four years. I therefore think it but fitting that the deliberations of this body should be paused for a moment out of respect to the memory of this eminent citizen.

Time forbids an elaboration upon his virtues or an extended detail of his public service to State and Nation.

His life and his achievements furnish a most striking example of the possibilities that may be attained by every American youth who has innate ability, integrity of purpose, indomitable courage, and abundant energy. From a log cabin in the woods of Ohio, where he was born, within the span of 66 years, he marched from obscurity through the gates of fame; and he blazed the path himself, unaided by parental fortune or official influence. God blessed him with a giant stature and a splendid brain. These implements were sufficient for his success. As a farmer boy, newspaper reporter, lawyer, and statesman, he performed well his part, and he never sought advancement until he was sure of his course and his ability to hold advanced position.

The great ambition of Senator Fairbanks as a boy was to be a successful lawyer, and all the things else that he did were preparatory stepping stones to this end. After being admitted to the bar in Ohio he removed to Indianapolis, Ind., in 1874, to make that rapidly growing commercial city his future home. He was a stranger in a strange city, but he had chosen a fertile field in which to employ his talents. There were giants in the practice of law in Indianapolis then, many of whom had national reputation as lawyers. Among them were Benjamin Harrison, Thomas A. Hendricks, Joseph E. McDonald, Walter Q. Gresham, Abe Hendricks, John W. Butler, Jonathan Gordon, Tom Brown, George W. Julian, and a score of others. Among this imposing coterie of lawyers Mr. Fairbanks began the practice in a modest way, and rapidly advanced until within a very few years he was a peer with the eminent practitioners that I have just named.

While primarily engrossed in the practice of law, Mr. Fairbanks found time to take part in the political affairs of Indiana, and from 1888, when he acted as manager of the forces supporting Walter Q. Gresham for President of the United States as against Benjamin Harrison, down to his death there was never a campaign in Indiana in which Mr. Fairbanks did not take an active part. He was the unanimous choice of his party for the United States Senate in 1897 and again in 1903. He served in that body continuously for eight years, and was then elected Vice President of the United States for four years. He was in the Senate during all the time that McKinley was President. He was President McKinley's fast and devoted friend, and this friendship was reciprocated. Had it not been for the untimely death of the President, in all probability Mr. Fairbanks would have succeeded him. Senator Mark Hanna, who was closer to President McKinley than any other living man, said soon after the death of the President that the greatest personal loss sustained by any man in the death of McKinley was sustained by Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, and that in his opinion Fairbanks would have been his logical successor.

Mr. Fairbanks was a Republican of the old school, and he never deviated from the cardinal principles of the party. Others wandered away for a time and returned, but he remained steadfast throughout. In 1892, when the whole country seemed to be going wild on the subject of free silver, Mr. Fairbanks, as chairman of the Indiana Republican State convention, declared that "the Republican Party stands for a sound and honest dollar and must ever stand for a stable currency." In 1896 he wrote a plank into the Republican platform of Indiana declaring in favor of the gold standard, and, through mighty opposition, had it adopted by the convention. It took great courage then to do this thing, but Fairbanks was a man of courage whenever and wherever principle was involved. He was the temporary chairman of the Republican national convention in 1896, and his speech delivered on that occasion was the keynote for the ensuing campaign. In it he was bold to declare for sound money and a protective tariff, and in his adherence to these two fundamental principles of the Republican Party he never wavered.

After Senator Fairbanks retired from public life he did not go into seclusion, as many others have done, and he never lost interest in matters that pertain to the welfare either of the State or Nation. He was ever ready to respond to any service assigned him, no matter what it was, and he always dignified that service. He was a member of the commission for the State of Indiana to the Panama Exposition held at San Francisco. He took as much interest in the duties devolving upon him in that capacity as he did in every other official duty, and the speech that he made at the dedication of the Indiana Building on the exposition grounds was one of the greatest public utterances he ever made.

He was kind and affable always; ever a courteous gentleman. As a Member of the United States Senate he won the respect of all his associates. As Vice President of the United States and presiding officer of the Senate he made a reputation for fairness seldom equaled and never excelled by any of his predecessors.

When this war broke out Mr. Fairbanks immediately tendered his services to the State and to the Nation, and there was not a day, until stricken by his last illness, but what he did something for his country. He was on a speaking tour in behalf of the second liberty loan when his physical breakdown came, from which he never rallied.

His was a well-rounded life, but he died too soon. There was still much for him to do. There was still much that he would like to have done for the country he so truly loved. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 9959. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roster of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SAFETY OF EMPLOYEES AND TRAVELERS UPON RAILROADS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 10297.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10297) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10297, with Mr. LINTHICUM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10297, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911, be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

In the thirteenth line of section 3 strike out the word "four" and insert the word "five," and in the fourteenth line of section 3 strike out the word "three" and insert the word "four."

In the fourteenth line of section 4 strike out the words "one thousand eight hundred" and insert the words "three thousand."

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto,' approved February 7, 1911, as amended, be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

"'Amend section 3 so as to provide that the salary of the chief inspector shall be $5,000 per year; the salary of each assistant inspector shall be $4,000 per year.

"'Amend section 4 so as to provide that the salary of each district inspector shall be $3,000 per year.'

"SEC. 2. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as amending, altering, or repealing any of the other provisions of said sections."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, two years ago a bill similar to this, in fact identical in almost every respect, was introduced, favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and passed the House, but failed to receive consideration in the Senate.

The object of this bill is to increase the salary of the chief inspector of the Boiler-Inspection Service from $4,000 to $5,000 a year, and the salaries of the two assistants from $3,000 to $4,000, and to make the salaries of the district inspectors $3,000.

The boiler-inspection law was passed in 1911 or 1912. It was passed simply as a boiler-inspection law, with no duties other than those pertaining to boilers, and the salaries fixed at that time were fixed with reference to the service being limited to boiler inspection only. After that Congress amended the law and included the inspection of engines and tenders, which doubled the work and responsibilities of the inspectors, without increasing the compensation therefor. These inspectors have performed a valuable service along the line of securing greater safety to the traveling public and to the trainmen themselves. I wish to read a few statements made in behalf of the bill as a part of my remarks. This service is under the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Commissioner Charles C. McChord, the member of the commission under whom these men serve, was before the committee. I will read only a part of his statement as follows:

I think these salaries ought to be increased. I think the bill is fair and just, and I think the amount fixed there—$5,000 for the chief inspector, and $4,000 for the other two assistants, and $3,000 for the other inspectors—is fair and right. I do not believe we can hold our men unless we do that, although they have been loyal and stuck to us when they have had offers, a good many of them, elsewhere. They are all thoroughly competent, and they have had experience. I think they are worthy of the money that this bill provides, and I am very anxious to see them get it, because I know their value and I know that they are worth it.

Mr. W. S. Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, made the following statement:

I simply want to say this, and I will only take two or three minutes, that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, as you know, is the father of the boiler-inspection law. With the help of our good friends we finally got it, and we had a selfish motive in it. We were not only trying to save the lives of the traveling public but of our men, and we are vitally interested in having good inspection; and this bill meets with our hearty approval because we know we are not going to be able to keep these men unless we can pay them a living wage. We all know what the cost of living is at the present time as compared with a year or two ago, and they feel it just as much as any other people.

I approach this subject from the selfish standpoint of the executive officer of a great organization. For example, last month we paid insurance for 102 engineers. Twenty-two of those engineers were killed on duty; 43 died from pneumonia, undoubtedly due to exposure and to leaky engines and the severe weather. So we hope that you gentlemen can see your way clear to report out this bill as it is drafted and give it your indorsement, because it is absolutely necessary to keep these men. These railroads must be kept running. We must surround these railroads and the men who operate them, as well as the traveling public, with every safeguard possible. The Director General of the Railroads has just said to the executive officers of these organizations that we can not win this war unless we can keep these railroads running to their limit; and in order to do that we want the best inspection possible.

I will not read from others, as the statements are all along the same line. When this bill was passed the inspectors of the Interstate Commerce Commission of like rank and grade were paid only $1,800. This was six years ago. The district inspectors, of whom there are 50, have to pass a rigid special examination to test their qualifications. They are not simply inspectors, but they are inspectors in chief, because they have all the inspectors of the railroads under them. Their work has been doubled, and their responsibility doubled, without any increase whatever in compensation. Two years ago, when the bill was reported and passed, the committee put the salaries of the district inspectors at $2,400. This was an increase of $600 a year. We believe that $3,000 is more in harmony with the service performed by these men, with the salaries of the assistant chief at $4,000, and of the chief inspector at $5,000. The cost of maintaining an ordinary family has certainly increased very materially over what it was at that time. Therefore I think $3,000, or $250 a month for the district inspectors, who must travel all the time, and who have all the railroad inspectors, both as to boilers and engines, under their supervision and care, is not too great an increase, although I admit that the percentage of increase is large.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say that this increase of the salaries of the district inspectors is one of the few salary increases which I favor; but I want to ask the gentleman if his statement is correct that there are only 50 inspectors for all the locomotives in the United States?

Mr. SIMS. Only 50 district inspectors in service under the Interstate Commerce Commission in the enforcement of this safety-appliance law.

Mr. WALSH. For the entire United States?

Mr. SIMS. There is the chief inspector, Mr. McManamy, 2 assistant inspectors, and 50 district inspectors; that is all.

Mr. WALSH. That is for the entire country?

Mr. SIMS. For the whole United States.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me there ought to be more than that number.

Mr. SIMS. Probably there ought to be; but that shows the tremendous service they are performing.

Mr. FOSTER. There are other inspectors besides the district inspectors?

Mr. SIMS. No other Federal inspectors under the Interstate Commerce Commission. The railroads have their own inspectors, but these are the official inspectors of the United States Government, and the reduction in the number of accidents has been wonderful since they began their work.

Mr. FOSTER. These 50 district inspectors are the ones who travel and see that the law is enforced? That is it, is it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. So that there are no others that do inspecting, except what is done by the railroad companies themselves.

Mr. SIMS. That is all; but these 50 inspectors do inspecting work personally.

Mr. RAYBURN. There are other inspectors in each district.

Mr. SIMS. No other Federal inspectors.

Mr. FOSTER. And these 50 inspectors do inspect all railroad boilers?

Mr. SIMS. And engines.

Mr. FOSTER. They travel around to see that it is done?

Mr. SIMS. They travel in their districts all the time. They do both inspecting and supervision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, is it possible the Government would lose the services of any of these men if these salaries were not increased?

Mr. SIMS. They have already lost some of them. That is the trouble. Mr. McManamy has used his influence to retain them in the service when they are offered very greatly increased compensation to go elsewhere, and they have remained patriotically in the service. Mr. McManamy now has under his charge 78,000 locomotives.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman familiar with the salaries paid to the employees of the Interstate Commerce Commission who value the railroads?

Mr. SIMS. No; I am not well enough informed to answer questions about that matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the work done by these district inspectors of a nature that aids in the saving of human life?

Mr. SIMS. It is a life-saving service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The work done in the valuation of the railroads is more of a clerical character, and I wanted to know if the gentleman could make any comparison of their compensation with that of the compensation paid to these practical workers who are mechanical experts.

Mr. SIMS. I could not, for I have not looked that up; but I am just about to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], who wrote the report on a similar bill two years ago, and the report has been largely followed by the committee at this time. I now propose to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], who can, perhaps, answer questions in detail better than I can.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope he will; and before the gentleman closes I want to say that the work done by these inspectors is of very great importance, whereas it is a question whether the valuation of railroads is of any value whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the gentleman yields the floor, will he answer one question. In addition to the salary of $1,800 do these district inspectors get any per diem?

Mr. SIMS. They get an expense allowance. Perhaps the gentleman from Wisconsin would like to use some of his time.

Mr. ESCH. I have also promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the original act relating to the inspection of locomotive boilers was passed in 1911. That act created a chief inspector, two assistants, and 50 district inspectors. Their duties were confined to locomotive boilers and nothing else.

In 1915, March 4, Congress passed an act extending the work of these inspectors to all parts of the locomotive, including airbrakes, couplings, grab irons, handholds, headlights, and all other parts of the locomotive. When that act was passed it required that these inspectors appointed under the original act should take another civil-service examination to ascertain whether they would be fitted to fulfill the added duties created by the act of 1915, so that they would be capable of investigating the whole locomotive and determining whether it had any defects. This act of 1915 greatly increased the duties and responsibilities of these inspectors.

But the act of 1915 gave no increase of pay, and so it remained at $1,800, the original amount fixed. I need scarcely dwell on the excellent results following the enactment of the act of 1911, but a few figures are significant.

In 1912, the first year after the enactment of the law, the injured were 1,005 and killed 91. In 1913, the second year after the passage of the act, the injured had been reduced to 911 and the killed to 36. In 1914 the injured had been reduced to 614 and the killed to 23. In 1915 the injured had been reduced to 467, while the killed amounted to only 13. No other department of the Government, having reference to the safety of human life, can make a showing as remarkable as that of this department investigating locomotives. Their duties being increased by the act of 1915 will have a tendency to further reduce the number of injured and the number of killed on locomotives.

In reference to these duties the act of 1915 extending the duties to the whole locomotive has compelled the inspectors to a further preparation for a more intensive study of all parts of the locomotive. They must have a knowledge of optical and electrical equipment, because most locomotives on trunk lines have electric headlights; they must have a thorough knowledge of airbrakes and airbrake equipment, a knowledge of mechanical devices, for as you know these are being added to the locomotives almost month by month. So they have an enlarged field of operation with increase of responsibility, but with no increase of pay since the original act was passed.

In relation to expense they are allowed a per diem of $4. I have gone through the testimony and picked out at random reports of inspectors, not selected with reference to any particular place, but all over the United States. They were asked to report on hotel expenses, home expenses, disparity of pay, and other items.

Here is the report of an inspector from Nashville, Tenn. He says:

Duties: On account of local conditions, I have to work 10 to 18 hours a day.

Hotel expenses: Nearly all hotels have the American plan in Tennessee, and while one could live some years ago on $3 to $4 per day, one has now to pay $5 per day, with reduced quantity and quality of food.

Disparity of pay: Roundhouse foremen receive from $165 to $190 per month.

Here is another from the inspector at Jersey City, N. J.:

Household expenses: Household expenses have increased 50 per cent, and I have been compelled to draw upon my savings.

Hotel expenses: Practically all hotels in my district have advanced rates from $1.50 to $2.50 and $2.50 to $3; meals in proportion.

Clothing: Wearing apparel has increased in cost 75 per cent.

Here is still another from an inspector located in Chicago:

Disparity of pay: Foremen boiler makers receive from $175 to $225 per month; general boiler inspectors, $175 to $225 per month (with expense account); master mechanics, $225 to $275 per month (with expense account); superintendents of motive power, $5,000 to $7,000 per year. Our salaries are $157.50 per month (with per diem).

Household expenses: Food, clothing, and rents have so increased that nothing can be saved for a rainy day.

These are the employees of the railroad companies and these are the salaries which these railroad companies are paying these men, and yet they are largely in excess of the pay given to these inspectors. I could cite many other illustrations. Here is another one from Chicago. He says:

Duties: Have increased since February, 1911, when we were required to inspect only locomotive boilers, while at present we have to inspect the entire locomotive and tender and to perform duties relative to maintenance and operation. The work takes the inspectors away from home 30 to 60 days at a time. Inspectors are obliged to jump here and there, investigate accidents, work on priority orders, and assist in railway operation, which causes added expense for laundry, hotel rooms, and other necessary charges.

Household expenses: Are as high as those on the road.

Hotel expenses: Two or three times higher than five years ago and steadily mounting—hotel rooms costing $1 to $1.25 are now $2.25 to $3; meals have increased from 50 cents to $1 and $1.50. Every other expense is correspondingly high.

Disparity of pay: The pay of an inspector is scarcely half that paid railway employees engaged in similar work.

So that judged from this testimony that comes from these inspectors in the field, we conclude that they must be away from their homes for the greater portion of each month; that their per diem allowance of $4 is not sufficient; that some of them have to draw upon their savings in order that they may continue Government service. Some of them have been induced to leave the Government service because of larger pay offered them by private industries, and in these times when mechanics are so needed in shipyards and other industries it is difficult to resist the temptation of leaving the Government service and securing this higher pay. We must therefore give them a reasonable wage for the responsibilities they have to perform.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the number of resignations of these district inspectors during the past six months?

Mr. ESCH. At the time the testimony was given, about two months ago, the chief inspector, Mr. McManamy, stated that three had resigned and that several had written with reference to a possible change of their employment. I can not give the gentleman any further detail than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what pay those three received in the new positions which they undertook?

Mr. ESCH. I understood one of them had an offer of $350 a month. His pay then was $157.50. Another I think had an offer that was very much in excess of the pay that he got from the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Those three instances, I suppose, were instances of men of superior ability who could fill more responsible positions than that of a district inspector.

Mr. ESCH. Oh, these district inspectors are high-class men. They have stood two civil-service tests since 1911.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I might suggest also that the testimony shows that if it had not been for the importunities of the chief inspector himself others would have resigned.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman think if this bill goes through fixing the salaries as proposed that that will stop their resigning and going into private employment where the private employer proposes to pay an increased salary?

Mr. ESCH. We are assured that it will have that effect. I have reason to believe that these men who have a great pride in their work because of the results they have accomplished will be willing to stand by their Government. It is a remarkable service. The accomplishments are unparalleled. The men take a pride in their work, but when one of these Government inspectors has to draw upon his private savings in order to remain with the Government I am not one who can blame him if he seeks another job.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman state how many inspectors have been obliged to draw on their private savings in order to retain their positions?

Mr. ESCH. I have not gone through the reports of the inspectors, but I have noted three of them make that specific statement. I do not know how many others there may be.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent have they been obliged to draw upon their private savings?

Mr. ESCH. Oh, I could not tell the gentleman that.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand it, this increases the salary of the chief inspector from $4,000 to $5,000?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And the assistants from $3,000 to $4,000?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And the 50 assistants from $1,800 to $3,000?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. The allowance per diem will be the same?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no increase in that?

Mr. ESCH. Not at all.

Mr ROBBINS. Has this proposed increase been suggested to the Director General of Railways, since he has taken over the railways of the United States?

Mr. ESCH. I do not know that that comes within his jurisdiction.

Mr. SIMS. He has no power to act.

Mr. ROBBINS. These inspectors make their reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And will continue, of course, to report to that commission.

Mr. ESCH. Yes. The bill does not change their status in that respect.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no doubt that these assistant inspectors ought to be paid more, because they are a skilled class of men. This does not increase the number?

Mr. ESCH. Not at all.

Mr. SNOOK. In connection with the question that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has asked, I suggest that it was brought out in the hearings that the Director General and the Interstate Commerce Commission also used these men very largely at the time the railroads were being taken over, or just before, in respect to the state of the freight congestion.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I thank the gentleman for suggesting that. I wish to say that these inspectors have been required to do a multitude of duties that are not directly concerned with locomotive inspection.

In January and February, during the congestion owing to the strenuous winter weather, Commissioner McChord, upon the suggestion of the Director General, had every one of these 50 inspectors go to the main terminals and centers of congestion and there report the actual circumstances from day to day and those reports were received and were very instrumental in suggesting to the Director General remedial orders, and these men did this in addition to their duties as inspectors of locomotives, and they spent nights and days in that task. I might say as to increases for these inspectors, while on the face of the bill it appears to be an increase of $1,800 to $3,000, making an increase of $1,200, it must be remembered that this horizontal increase to Government employees now pending in the Senate or in conference amounts to $120, and these men getting $1,800 would be entitled to that increase. If they get $3,000 as granted by this bill, they will not participate in that increase, so that really the increase they are getting by this legislation is not $1,200 a year but $1,080, and the total amount of increase therefore because of this bill is only $54,000. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak briefly concerning the provisions of this bill. I had the honor of serving during the last Congress on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. At that time a similar bill was before the committee, was reported to the House, and passed. The bill never passed the Senate and it is now again before the House for consideration. I took the trouble at that time to investigate the question of increasing the salaries of boiler inspectors. Under the law as it was originally passed their salary was fixed at $1,800 a year. I was thoroughly satisfied that it was wholly inadequate for the service these men rendered and for the standard of talent required in the work which they were expected to do. The bill as it passed the House at that time provided an increase for the district inspectors from $1,800 to $2,400 a year. I thought then that $2,400 a year was less than the salary ought to be and that the bill should have provided for higher pay. Since then conditions have so changed that it makes it clearly justifiable in allowing these men $3,000 a year. We all know that in the last year the tendency has been to increase wages everywhere, to increase pay everywhere, due to the high cost of living and to the extraordinary expenses that people are put to who are traveling about, and that of itself is a very potent reason why this increase should be made. Then there is another reason. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] stated that after the original law was passed the duties of these men had been largely increased. Originally they were required to inspect only the boilers of locomotives. Under the amendment to the law which was passed three or four years later their duties were extended to the entire locomotive and the tender in addition to the inspection of the boiler, and they were required to take an additional civil-service examination to determine their qualifications for these additional duties, and that was the condition two years ago when the bill passed the House at $2,400 a year.

Since that time additional duties have been imposed on these men that justifies more salary. Under the Director General of Railroads the chief inspector has been put in charge of the entire locomotive power of the railroads of the country. He has made it the duty of the chief inspector through the district inspectors to see that the locomotive power of the country is kept in the best possible condition. When engines and boilers are defective they are sent to the repair shop and the inspectors are given jurisdiction and control over repairs. It is their duty to see to it that they are repaired with the greatest possible speed and again returned to active duty on the road. This increases their duties very greatly under the ruling of the Director of Railroads. I think in the first four years of the operation of this law these district inspectors inspected on an average of nearly 100,000 boilers every year. It ran from seventy-five to ninety-five thousand boilers every year that these men were required to inspect. On their order a defective boiler and a defective engine must now be returned to the shop, and they have ordered during that time nearly 15,000 boilers and locomotives returned to the repair shop where they found them not in proper condition for actual work of the road. When we come to consider the result, when we come to consider the fact that this work has accomplished in a great measure the purpose for which it was intended, we must agree that it was a very wise piece of legislation that Congress enacted when it passed this locomotive-boiler inspection law. Let me call attention to these figures. In 1912, the first year after the boiler-inspection law was passed, there were 91 persons killed during that year from defective boilers. From accidents arising from defective boilers during that year there were 1,005 persons injured.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. SIMS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Three years later, after the law had been in operation from 1912 to 1915, and before the duties of these men had been extended to the entire locomotive and the tender, during the time when they were simply required to inspect the boilers alone, in 1915 there were only 13 persons killed from accidents arising from defective boilers, and instead of 1,005 persons injured from the same cause there were only 467 persons injured that year. This result can be traced as a direct result of this legislation. Every year from the time this law first went into effect down to the present time the accidents and injuries have gradually decreased from year to year just as the law became effective and just as the duties of these men operated upon the locomotives and the boilers in operation on the railroads of the country. I submit to the Members of the House that the proof is now clear that Congress has exercised great wisdom in the passage of four pieces of legislation intended to save human life and conserve human limbs on railroads. The first was the safety-appliance law, that applied to automatic couplers, to the brake system on railroads, to the grab irons, the handholds on cars. Another was the ash-pan act.

Another was this law providing for the inspection of boilers and locomotives, and the fourth law was the employers' liability act, which made the railroads responsible for seeing to it that they employed in these dangerous occupations on railroads only men qualified and competent to do the work. And it is a most interesting study to read the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the gradual decrease of deaths, injuries, and accidents on railroads from the time these laws went into operation to the present time. Under these laws conditions have so improved and will continue to improve so that the men working on railroads and the general public traveling on the railroads will be practically immune from danger due to accidents arising from defective machinery on trains and locomotives. I submit to the House that it is very important that the Interstate Commerce Commission be allowed latitude to select the very best men in the country, men best qualified to serve in this capacity, men competent and able to understand the duties they are to perform, so that the purpose and intent of the law be fully accomplished.

As has been stated, the railroad companies have been bidding higher for these men than the Government has been paying them. Two of them have already resigned to take higher pay with the railroad companies of the country. There has been a constant pressure from other sources to draw these men out of this employment into other employments, where they can command, and where, no doubt, they deserve and are entitled to better pay. If the railroad companies of the country can afford to pay these men better wages than $1,800 a year, the Government of the United States can afford to do so, and it is of importance to the proper administration of the law that able and experienced men be retained in this service.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to say that I recognize the futility of accomplishing anything in this House that seeks to curtail expenditures in the increase of salaries of officials which has the indorsement of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. And yet I feel it incumbent upon me to bring to the attention of the committee this exceptional piece of legislation, which if we would use it as a warrant to increase the salaries of all Government employees according to the changed standard of living, would involve this Government to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. And yet this committee comes here and adopts this peculiar method of increasing the salaries of men from $1,800 to $3,000 at one swoop, increasing the salaries $1,200 of men who are to-day receiving with their expense account and per diem of $4 every day in the year, some of which is pure salary, an average, I may say, of $2,600. The per diem that is allowed these men is paid them for every day in the year. As in other branches of the service they are paid that $4 per day whether they are in the field or not. It is established that that per diem for one-half of the year is pure salary. So I am within bounds when I say that one-half of the per diem for each day in the year, or $1,460, is salary. Now, these men to that extent are receiving $2,530.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Do you believe that at this time one of these inspectors can travel the number of miles that he does and live on $2 a day, paying his hotel expenses and paying for his meals?

Mr. STAFFORD. The testimony before the Committee on Appropriations is, and the testimony before the committee, of which the gentleman is a member, shows, they can live on $4 a day. Now, if they can live on $4 a day, which they are receiving, and only one-half of the days of the year they are in the field, therefore the remaining half of the days of the year is pure salary, or $770.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman if he says that these men are only half of their time in the field?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. On what do you base that statement?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, the statement here and in reading the hearings. Does the gentleman mean they are in the field 365 days in the year?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No; but they are in the field more than half of their time.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much of the time are all of the inspectors in the field? Is there any testimony that the gentleman has that will deny the statement I have made that they are in the field on the average only half of the time?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not think the gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not think. He has no proof to deny my statement.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has investigated these matters very carefully, I am sure. Is this $4 per diem paid to these inspectors when they are in their home cities?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; paid every day in the year. It amounts to a total of $1,460.

Mr. COX. If that is true, and I take it the gentleman has looked it up——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have the assurance of my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], that that is the rule.

Mr. COX. If that is true, I would like some member of this committee that has reported this bill to rise here and tell the Committee of the Whole why they are paying these men $4 a day when they are staying at their homes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the practice in other departments of the Government. Take, for instance, the Children's Bureau, connected with the Department of Labor, every employee of the Children's Bureau, in addition to their salary of $1,800 or $2,000, receives an allowance of $4 per day for every day in the year even when stationed at one place for every day in the year. That is one of the abuses of the service. I would not underrate the value of these inspectors. It was my honor to serve in a past Congress under that great legislator, who was chairman of this committee, the Hon. JAMES R. MANN. It was he who brought this bill to the House, and it had my cordial support, providing for the inspection of boilers. The increase is asked for the additional duties required of them under the act of 1915, merely requiring under that act that they give some attention to some parts of the appurtenances of the locomotive and tender. The real reason for this inspection service, as was pointed out when we drafted this bill, was in determining the character of the boilers, whether they were fit to carry passenger trains and also fit for freight service. That was the main service. Now, as usual, when a raid is being made for salary increases, some little additional services with added responsibilities are cited as reasons for increasing these men to the extraordinary extent of $1,200.

Now, what does the testimony show as to the salaries that are being paid by private employers for like work? I use the testimoney cited by my distinguished colleague [Mr. ESCH], who has given this subject as much and perhaps more attention than any other Member of this House. He cited in support of this inordinate increase of salaries of men from $1,800 to $3,000, that general boiler inspectors—and certainly these men do not hold any higher grade than general boiler inspectors—were receiving $175 to $225 per month, and their expenses when traveling. Now, what does that show? Take the maximum figure, $225 per month, and that is but $2,700 a year. But they merely get their actual expense account, and we know that in private employment men have to itemize that, and they do not get any "velvet" out of the per diem allowance. But here we intend to give not only $3,000, but we intend to give them $3,730.

The rôle of a person who tries to keep down salaries is not a pleasant one. It is an ungracious duty. But this committee has a record for bringing in bills for increasing salaries. I remember it recommended the increase of the salary of the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission from $5,000 to $7,500. It was my privilege to oppose that amendment, and the House voted that to remain at $5,000.

But here, gentlemen, to raise the salary of these inspectors at one fell swoop $1,200, to raise them $1,000 more than is being paid for the same character of work in private employement, is, I think, going away beyond what the conditions demand.

These inspectors are Government employees. The position that the Committee on Appropriations has taken—and I think it should be followed by the Congress—is that as to the higher-priced employees there should be no increases during the war; that every Government employee must recognize that we are at war, that he must contribute his part toward bearing the burden of the Government. I, for one, do not want an employee of the Government to work for less than his services to the Government are worth. But these men are given a tenure for life, and that is a great asset, unquestionably, under Government employment. We know why men in the departments are holding on to their positions when they can get more in private employment. It is because they have the security of position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. These men, having the security of their positions and upon the recommendation of the executive heads, request an increase. If you will study the recommendations of the department heads in the Book of Estimates you will find that they invariably recommend increases of its higher-paid officials, but the Committee on Appropriations has declined to follow their recommendations in this war period. We realize that if we once adopt that policy it will result in the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars, and we could not afford in these times to adopt that policy.

This bill went through the last Congress with the salaries of these division inspectors placed at $2,400. The proponents point to the high cost of living. True, the cost of living has even gone up since that bill was passed. But that is no reason for fixing salaries permanently on abnormal conditions of the present. When you analyze this bill you can not justify the extraordinary increase of these men's salaries from $1,800 to $3,000. The hearings do not justify it. The established policy of Congress does not justify it. I favor some reasonable increase to these men if they are not receiving a proper salary, but I do not believe we are justified in granting them at one fell swoop, as I said before, an increase of $1,200.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. How does that increase, that you say amounts to $3,750—that is, the increased salary and per diem—compare with the increase allowed by the wage board to other employees in their recent report?

Mr. STAFFORD. I must confess that I have not had time to examine the report of the wage board. I assume that that wage report was founded on the scale of wages being paid in private employment. I have taken the hearings and have read extracts to gentlemen, which I repeat again from the testimony on this bill, showing that general boiler inspectors receive from $175 to $225 per month with expense accounts, and that makes a salary of $2,700 a year. But these men are going to receive $3,700, when you take into consideration the fact that one-half of the per diem is pure salary. That is what you are doing here. Can you justify it in these strained conditions that prevail in the finances of the country? I do not think you can.

But I did not rise for the purpose of disparaging the great work these men were doing. As I said before, this bill had my support when it was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the Sixty-first Congress. But we should not run wild just because it has the indorsement of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers or because it has the recommendation of one of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, a few years ago Congress passed what is known as the safety-appliance law, to promote the safety of employees and the traveling public on our railroads. Now, we all know the great benefits that the American people and the employees of the railroads have derived from the passage of that law. It was necessary to have some inspectors to enforce the safety-appliance law, and we have before us for consideration at this time a bill increasing the salaries of the locomotive-boiler inspectors.

The locomotive-boiler inspectors not only inspect the locomotive boilers, but they have charge of the inspection of the entire locomotive. There are many things about a locomotive which are dangerous to the traveling public and to the railroad employees besides the boilers. These inspectors see to it that the air brakes and the apparatus that furnishes the air on the locomotive are all in good working order. They see to it that the piston packing is in good shape. During the cold weather if the locomotives have a leak in a piston packing the steam escapes in such a way that it obstructs the vision of the locomotive engineer and makes it impossible for him to see the signals. That makes it dangerous not only to the traveling public but to the employees themselves.

I speak from my own personal experience as to what these inspectors have done. Before this law was passed and these inspectors were placed in these positions the railroad engineer had no option in the matter. If the roundhouse foreman told him to take a certain engine out, whether it was in good condition or not, he had to take that locomotive out on the road, to the detriment not only of himself, but to the danger of the traveling public.

These inspectors are all very high-class men. They are men of mechanical minds, men who have been trained all their lives around the locomotive shops in repair work and in rebuilding locomotives, and I believe that they ought to be granted an increase of salary, because they are men of high caliber.

I was a little surprised to hear my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] say that he was given to understand that these men put in about half of their time at home and thereby saved this $4 per diem which they received for traveling expenses. The fact is that we have only 50 locomotive-boiler inspectors throughout the entire United States, and at this time we have about 73,000 locomotives; or, in other words, each one of these locomotive-boiler inspectors will have from 1,200 to 1,500 locomotives to inspect. Now, it seems to me that when an inspector has from 1,200 to 1,500 locomotives to inspect he can not put in very much time at home. It may be, around a large industrial center like the city of Chicago or Pittsburgh or New York, where they have a good many locomotives in there all the time, that these inspectors at these special points may have the privilege of being at home quite often. But how about the inspectors who travel all over the United States? I believe I speak correctly when I say that for some of the States they have not more than one inspector. That inspector has to travel all over the State. He has to ride night and day. He has to jump from this place to that and catch these locomotives on the road and give them their inspection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to convey the impression to the House that these locomotive inspectors make the inspection of the locomotive while it is in operation?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Absolutely so.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that the testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, when this inspection measure was originally proposed, back in 1910, was to the effect that the only way you could inspect a locomotive boiler was to get inside and determine whether is would stand the water test. Of course, I can understand that as far as the appurtenances of the boiler are concerned, like the water gauges and stopcocks and the like, they could be inspected while the locomotive was in use, but to determine whether the boiler is fit for use they have to apply the water test to it when it is not in motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not informed at all in regard to the duties of these locomotive boiler inspectors. These Government inspectors do not crawl into the boiler at all. That physical inspection is done by the engine-house foreman, and after he makes this inspection it is sworn to in an affidavit. It is the duty of these United States district inspectors to see to it that these regular inspections of the boiler are made every 2 weeks or every 30 days. It is the duty of the inspector to travel on the road and catch the locomotive out on the road. How is he going to tell whether a piston packing is blowing or not if the locomotive is not working? He can not tell whether a piston packing is blowing if the locomotive is standing still, because when it is standing still it is not using any steam. How can he tell whether the gauge cocks are in good working order or not unless he catches the locomotive out on the road when it is working? How can he tell whether the water glass is in good condition or not, and whether the water is working freely up and down in the glass unless he inspects the engine out on the road? I speak from my own personal experience regarding their work. I have had them come to locomotives which I have been driving time and again, and stop me right in the yard or on the road and examine the locomotive from one end to the other. The position of these inspectors is very responsible, and I say they ought to be granted an increase in salary, because they are high-class men. The traveling public of the United States depend upon these locomotive inspectors to a great extent for the safety of their lives and their well-being when they are traveling over our railroads. I can state personally that it has been a godsend and a blessing to the American railway employees to have these men inspect their locomotives. I trust that the House will pass this bill. I believe it is fair and just, and I believe these men ought to be granted this increase which they are asking for. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I quite agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], that it is not a pleasant task to undertake the duty of holding down the constant increases of salaries in this House. I assure every gentleman present that it is not a pleasant duty upon my part. I would rather make an individual in this world feel better, if only for a moment, and have him say something kind about me, than to make him feel badly and say something ill of me. I know that the easiest way out of these things, as far as a Member is concerned, is simply to swallow everything—hook, line, and bait—no matter what is put up to us, never criticise it, never raise any question about it, but vote for it, and in that way we will get along best back home.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is a little evidence, to my mind, of what the Congress of the United States has got to come to. This eternal expenditure of money has got to stop somewhere. I know if a man raises that question on the floor of the House he is met instantly by the argument that we are the richest Nation upon the earth; that we should not even pause a moment to criticize expenditures in any way whatever, but that we should let these things go, whatever they may be. I am not sure but that the system we have in the formation of committees has brought upon this House the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars a year, and I am sure that we have got to go to a budget system in Congress. I doubt very much whether we will ever be able to do it until both parties incorporate that as a plank in their platforms and elect Members of Congress who will vote for a budget when they come here. If you raise the question of a budget on the floor of the House, immediately you strike some chairman of a committee reporting appropriations, and immediately you begin to strike Members of the House who are opposed to a budget system because they do not want to lose their positions on an important appropriating committee of which they have been members for many years. My idea is that we have got to come not only to a budget system, so far as appropriations are concerned, but to a budget system of raising revenue and make the appropriations by the same identical committee. It is no use to say we can not do it; that our form of government will not submit to it, because it will, and we can do it if we resolutely set our heads to accomplish that end.

Now, a word about this bill. These men are good men. There is no question about that. But I earnestly ask you if you do not feel that this increase of salaries is too much? The assistant secretaries of the various departments of the Government get only $5,000 a year. In all sincerity, do you not believe that if this chief inspector had an increase of $500 a year, making him a total of $4,500 per year, that would be enough for him; and do you not think that when you increase the salaries of these assistant inspectors from $3,000 to $4,000 a year that is too much of an increase? And to increase the salaries of all these 50 inspectors from $1,800 a year to $3,000 a year, in my opinion, is an increase which is out of all proportion.

Now, what is the argument used here by the gentlemen bringing this bill on the floor of the House to justify these increases. They say that a few inspectors are quitting their line of work and going into a similar line in private life. Are we to be compelled to pay a salary so that no man will quit a Government position and return to private life; and if so, where is the line going to be drawn? To turn the situation around, thousands upon thousands of men are leaving private life and going into public life to-day. It merely means a shifting or changing of positions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. COX. I undertake to say that this very minute there are not less than 1,000 applications now at the Interstate Commerce Commission for these $1,800 positions. Three years ago a man wanted to stand a civil-service examination for one of these positions, and I went down to look the matter up. If I recollect correctly, there were upward of 1,100 applicants ahead of him. I dare say that you will find approximately that number there to-day—1,100 men qualified to stand a civil-service examination, willing and anxious to get these jobs at $1,800 a year. But two have resigned, and in order to keep the force intact we must raise the salaries to $3,000 a year!

Now, take the $4 per diem; that is too much. We ought not to pay these inspectors or any other inspectors, I care not in what department they may work, $4 a day when they are at home, eat at their own table, and sleeping in their own beds. How do you account for it? Is it right?

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman has been a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a long while.

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. How is it with post-office inspectors?

Mr. COX. They get $3 a day.

Mr. ESCH. For every day in the year and while absent?

Mr. COX. Two thousand or twenty-two hundred are allowed every day in the year.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, I believe the gentleman is in error. That was the condition until an amendment was placed in the bill reported in the Fifty-sixth Congress. When that abuse was called to the attention of the committee, back in 1904, it was remedied so that they would be only entitled to a per diem when away from the designated place.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, of course we all admire and oftentimes applaud those who are generally known as the watchdogs of the Treasury, but very frequently their bark is more potent than their bite; and what is also essentially true, they oftentimes bite the wrong individual, at the wrong time, and in the wrong place. [Laughter.]

As illustrative of this fact, this bill in itself is an exemplification. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who rose from the engine cab to become a Congressman, very fully explained the nature and class of duties that these men as district inspectors are obliged to perform. I would not for one moment attempt to enlarge on that subject. But let me give to this House some knowledge of these subjects which I myself had in my earlier days, when I, too, served on the railroad.

The railroad inspector of engines and boilers and mechanical parts of the engines—in other words, the man who has charge of the motive power of a train—has in his keeping the life and safety of every individual on that train—of the conductor and brakeman, the engineer and fireman, and as well as every man who pays fare on the train—and, therefore, initially it is true that the safety of the entire traveling public as well as the safety of the employees of the railroad company is dependent in a large measure on the efficiency of this inspection. This inspection is what we call district inspection by 50 employees of the Government. It is their duty to see that the inspection is performed by the railroad inspectors. In other words, the engine in the roundhouse is taken out by the man who is called the jockey or hostler. The jockey gets the engine and takes it to the place where the engineer gets possession of it. Prior to the initiation of this system the jockey took the engine which the foreman gave him, gave it to the engineer, and the engineer was obliged to run it whether it was faulty or perfect at the time he took it. The consequence was his safety and life was imperiled, and the safety and life of every individual on the train.

The Government took hold of the matter and said, "We will appoint our inspectors to see whether the inspection is performed," and now no engine can be taken out of the roundhouse unless it is subject to Government inspection once in 30 days.

Now, talking about the salaries my friend has spoken of, there is not a railroad conductor running on a through line that is not receiving at least $150 a month. He is paid by the trip. There is not an engineer in a cab to-day, running either on a freight train or a through passenger train, that is not receiving at least $200 a month on the trip route. The Government has proposed within a few short hours, or a few short days, that the salaries or compensation of these men, to wit, the engineers, conductors, firemen, and brakemen, shall be increased 25 per cent. What does that mean? If a conductor gets $150 a month, or $1,800 a year, and under Government regulations he gets 25 per cent more, he will get $2,250. An engineer getting $200 a month and an increase of 25 per cent will get $600 in addition, or $3,000 a year. A conductor gets $2,250, and yet these men do not have one iota of the responsibility of the man who is inspector of the motive power that moves the train.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Just one minute to answer the question.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire upon what authority the gentleman states that locomotive engineers on an average are paid $200 a month?

Mr. DEWALT. They receive more than that on an average. They are paid by the trip.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am told upon reliable authority by the gentleman to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania paid a compliment that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is away wrong in his figures.

Mr. DEWALT. There is not a locomotive engineer to-day on a through train, or even on a freight train, that is not paid by the trip, and their average is more than $4 to $5 a day, and I know whereof I speak.

Mr. STAFFORD. Four dollars to five dollars a day would not be $200 a month.

Mr. DEWALT. No; but they are paid by the trip, and they make more than that by overtime very frequently. One word more and I have concluded. If, then, the trackmen, the conductors, and the engineers who have charge of the motive power which is handed over to them after inspection should be given this raise, I ask why, in the name of common sense, should not these men who are experts and who know the construction of an engine and who are skilled in this particular line of duty be given a commensurate rate, and that, it seems to me, is the end of the argument.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a statement from Gen. E. H. Crowder, Provost Marshal General, as to what has been accomplished by the draft law up to date.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, does that in any way relate to the "work or fight" order?

Mr. DENT. No.

Mr. COX. I was in hopes that it would cover that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the next bill which I expect to call up is the lighthouse bill, and I have been exceedingly anxious to get through the discussion on this bill so as to consider that bill, for it is a very important measure. I have yielded to the gentlemen who understand the provisions of this bill in detail, so that they could answer such questions better than I could. I have nothing to say in reply to the perennial criticism always heard when an attempt is made to do dollar and cent justice to worthy Government employees to the effect that what is attempted in that direction is extravagant and wasteful expenditures. This is a life-saving service. These men do a most unwelcome duty. They have to inspect and give orders, doing that which is necessary for some one to do in the interest of public safety, and in my opinion the dollars to be spent in giving fair compensation should not be considered for a moment. They are in a way performing a military service at this time.

They are saving human life, they are making the travel of 100,000,000 people safer than it otherwise would be. They are saving to the property owners themselves millions of dollars by not permitting the railroads to use inefficient and dangerous equipment, but every time we raise the question here as between dollars and human life, between profits and human safety, someone is ready to fight it and make complaints about it being a costly expenditure. I think I personally know something about the expense of living at this time. A great proportion of these men have to live in towns and cities where necessary expenses are very high. They are justly entitled to this meager increase in this bill. They accepted this service patriotically and uncomplainingly at the beginning in order to install the service. They have shown their mettle, they have shown what they are worth, and when it is demonstrated that human life has been saved, that accidents have been reduced 50 per cent or more, we should not be deterred with arguments in regard to the little amount of money involved, in increasing the compensation of 53 men who in a way have charge of the life and the safety of every passenger and every employee upon the trains on all the railroads in the United States, and who are protecting the property of the owners of the railroads, which according to their own statements amounts to $20,000,000,000 in value. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the act entitled 'An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto,' approved February 17, 1911, as amended, be, and is hereby, amended as follows:

"'Amend section 3 so as to provide that the salary of the chief inspector shall be $5,000 per year; the salary of each assistant inspector shall be $4,000 per year.

"'Amend section 4 so as to provide that the salary of each district inspector shall be $3,000 per year.'

"SEC. 2. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as amending, altering, or repealing any of the other provisions of said sections."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no per diem shall be allowed an inspector except when in the field away from his home."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that amendment ought to be incorporated in this bill. I can not understand, for the life of me, and I never will understand, why a man who is drawing a salary, or who will draw a salary if it becomes a law, of $3,000 should be paid $4 per day when he is staying at home, eating at his own table, sleeping in his own bed, occupying his own house. There is a reason, of course, why you should pay an inspector traveling around away from home, because he is at some extra expense over what he would be if he were at home. I undertake to say that this $4 per diem is more than will be necessary to pay any of these inspectors, and, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] well stated a while ago, there will be at least 25 per cent, or even 50 per cent, of the per diem actually saved as salary at the end of each year by the inspector because he will not use it.

There are hundreds—yes, there are thousands—of cities in the United States to-day where the inspector or any other man, for that matter, can go and get a room, board, and lodging for $3 per day. There are hundreds of places in the United States to-day where an inspector or any other man can go and get a room and lodging for $2.50 a day. I recall, and I repeat on the floor of this House, that when Mr. WEEKS, of Massachusetts was chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, down to that time the post-office inspectors had been paid $4 per diem. It was at the request of the Post Office Committee that the Post Office Department took that question up with its inspectors. It put the inspectors on an actual expense basis for a period of three months. That proved that inspectors could live on $3 per day instead of $4. And that showed another thing, that by reducing the per diem from $4 to $3 per diem upon 2,200 inspectors it saved the Government upward of $60,000 per year. Now, gentlemen, why pay a man a per diem when he is at home, especially when you propose to increase the salary of that man from $1,800 to $3,000 per year, when you are giving an increase of salary of 75 per cent? Is it fair to the Treasury that you deliberately take out of the Treasury of the United States money and pay him while he is sitting around home and at his own fireside? But my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] says that when there is a question coming up here of saving human life that he is not going to pay any attention to any man who cries or talks about economy. There is a time coming when every Member of this House will pay attention to economy, and that time is not very far distant.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Is there any department of the Government where a per diem is paid, outside of the Post Office Department, where the per diem is not throughout the year?

Mr. COX. I do not know.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and it comes within the purview of that committee.

Mr. COX. I have been a member of that committee only for the last three months.

Mr. ESCH. I should not think there would be any reason to make any discrimination against the inspectors if all the other branches of the Government allow——

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that if there be any other per diem inspectors in any other branch of the Government they ought not to be paid a per diem while they are at home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. And if they are being paid a per diem while at home it is wrong, and two wrongs never make a right. If that is wrong, this is wrong, and if this is wrong it ought to be cut out. I do not take kindly to the argument at all that perchance because some other department is doing the same thing that another department should be given the same right. The fundamental question is, Is the other department right, is the other department on a sound basis, is the other department only paying actual travel or living expenses? If so, then that is all this department ought to have. If the other departments are paying more than the expenses, it is no right, it is no foundation, it is no reason why these men should have it. Now, I know this only saves a few dollars, not much, but it is a little. The principle is worth more than the money saved by it, and besides does any Member want to take the position that a man, unless he is paid an exorbitant salary and paid $4 per diem when he is at home, that that man will not look after the business of the traveling public as carefully as one receiving that increase of salary? Do you want to put it on that ground? Do you want to put it on that theory, you men who advocate this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement which perhaps will relieve the situation somewhat. Mr. McManamy has been just called up and asked about this per diem, and it is only paid when the inspector is actually on duty traveling and away from home.

Mr. COX. Then ought not the committee to accept my amendment?

Mr. SIMS. Why does the gentleman want it? You do not need it.

Mr. COX. What is the objection to it?

Mr. SIMS. It looks in the direction of a dollar, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman opposed to saving a dollar?

Mr. SIMS. It does not save a dollar, because they do not get it.

Mr. COX. It absolutely saves dollars in that it prevents an inspector from being paid any expenses except in the field.

Mr. SIMS. They only get paid for traveling, and their vouchers have to be approved.

Mr. COX. Then what objection can there be to the amendment?

Mr. SIMS. It is absolutely useless. It has served the gentleman to make a good speech, but there is no use in the amendment, because they only get it when they are on actual duty away from home.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought to prevail because there is no necessity for it. In the first place I am quite certain these men only get paid their per diem allowance when on the road.

Mr. SIMS. That is right.

Mr. MADDEN. But it is quite true they are on the road nearly all the time. Now, the men employed in this service must be first-class mechanics. They have got to understand the mechanism of all locomotives, boilers, and everything connected with them, and all its strong parts and weak parts, everything connected with it in order that they may be able to determine upon inspection exactly whether it is safe or not. The boiler inspector is obliged to go into the fire box. He is obliged to find out whether the crown sheet of the boiler is in perfect order or not; he is obliged to find out whether the boiler is supplied with a soft plug so that if the water should run low the boiler will not blow up; he is obliged to find out whether the crown sheet is in such shape as it ought to be, whether the flues are in such shape as will justify their continuance in the boiler; what pressure the boiler should carry with safety; what weak spots should be strengthened by repairs; where the boiler needs patching; whether patching should be permitted or whether a new boiler should be supplied.

He must know exactly what to do and when and where to do it. He is on the road for the purpose of finding out, and I presume to say that he will not be home one day a week.

These district boiler inspectors are men who have to go from place to place to ascertain the condition of the boilers that are running on the railroads in order that they may be able to furnish information to the railroad companies which will enable them to supply such repairs as will make the boiler safe. Every well-regulated business institution has its boilers inspected regularly, whether there is any law requiring the inspection of boilers by expert boiler inspectors or not, and the business concern that has the care of its men who are operating these boilers at heart will have the insurance companies that carry the insurance on the boilers make periodical investigation and inspection of the boilers, and that will furnish them information that will enable them to know where the weak spots in the boilers are. This is no sinecure of a job. I happen to know, and have visited the boilers with the inspectors at all hours of the night and have gone into the boilers with them. I know the work they have to do. And the compensation they receive for the work performed, no matter how large that compensation is, is not excessive. And to say that they should go out and travel over the road and go into the roundhouses throughout their district and not be paid for their cost of living while they are away is not right. And I am quite sure they are never paid except when they are away on duty.

And so far as the compensation itself is concerned, although it seems like a large increase over what they are now getting, it is not more than adequate. And the chief inspector certainly ought to be a man qualified to earn $5,000 a year in his calling, and he ought to get it, and would get it if he was engaged in private employment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to say that the chief inspector has had more duties placed upon him since the Government took over the railroads. He has charge of the locomotives of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Whether he has or not, he had an onerous job as it was, and one that required technical skill. He must be educated in his calling or he could not have performed the functions of the employment. And a man who is required to have technical education and is charged with the responsibility that the chief inspector has imposed upon him ought to be adequately recompensed for the work he does. And I hope that not only the compensation provided for in the bill will be allowed, but that the allowance for expenses of the district inspectors will be allowed without change.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the House with any argument on this proposition, which is a plain, straightforward business proposition; and I sympathize with the patriotic motives of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] to save as far as possible any wrongful encroachment upon the Treasury of the United States. I think that should be done in all bills, and I do not think the laboring men of the country will object to anything like that. But I do believe that the committee that originally framed the bill—not this amendment, but the original law—and Congress, when it enacted the law, have better provided for the safety of the Treasury in this regard than is provided by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. And, if you will permit me, I would like to read what the law is now:

> Each inspector shall receive a salary of $1,800 per year and his traveling expenses while engaged in the performance of his duty. He shall receive in addition thereto an allowance for office rent, stationery, and clerical assistance, to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but not to exceed in the case of any district inspector $600 per year.

I believe that that covers the points in the case. A man under that could not, while he was sleeping at home in his own bed, get any per diem. In fact, the bill does not provide any per diem. It is a question of getting his traveling expenses while he is actually in the performance of his duty. And I think the law is pretty well framed as it is.

And there is another thing that you should keep in mind, namely, that this $600 is the limit for expenses, and for my part, while I believe in economy, I also believe in efficiency, and there are some places where it is almost impossible for these inspectors in large cities to maintain an office on the amount which we provide here as a limit.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I believe it is a fact that these inspectors have to fill out an itemized statement of every dollar of expense they incur while traveling.

Mr. DECKER. I believe, gentlemen of the committee, that it would be well to vote down the amendment. The committee of this House that had the framing of the original bill and also the amendment has tried to keep in mind the welfare of the Treasury and also the safety of the people of the United States. I think it is pretty well written as it is; and much better, I think, than the extemporaneous amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

> On page 2, line 19, strike out the figures "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. Cox: Page 2, line 19, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 23.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LINTHICUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10297) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. MOON. To present the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill, for printing under the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads state whether he intends to call the report up for consideration to-morrow?

Mr. MOON. I hope so. I do not know whether we shall be able to do so or not, but I will be glad to do so if I can.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman if it is a complete agreement?

Mr. MOON. No, sir; it is not a complete agreement.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

Following are the conference report and accompanying statement:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 627).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 22, 26, and 60.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 5, 8, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 49, 51, 55, 56, 61, 62, 64, and 65, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 2 of the bill, in line 12, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 3 of the bill, in line 4, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 5 of the bill, in line 4, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 10 of the bill, in line 23, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 11 of the bill, in line 14, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 11 of the bill, in line 17, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,400,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 13 of the bill, in line 23 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "$200,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000"; and in line 25 strike out the word "the" where it first appears and insert in lieu thereof the word "this"; and in the same line strike out "contemplated by the appropriation title," so that the amendment as amended will read as follows: "Provided, That not to exceed $300,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available for the payment of this service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 14 of the bill, in line 13, strike out the word "the" where it first appears and insert in lieu thereof the word "this," and in the same line strike out the words "contemplated by the appropriation title," to that the amendment as amended will read as follows: "Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available for the payment of this service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 18 of the bill, in line 1 of the amendment proposed by the Senate, after the word "Winnepesaukee," insert the following: "from the post office at Laconia"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 19 of the bill, in line 22, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 22 of the bill, in line 25 of the matter proposed by the Senate, after the word "compensation," insert the word "thus"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$370,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1918, rural carriers assigned to horse-drawn vehicle routes on which daily service is performed shall receive $24 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage, and rural carriers assigned to horse-drawn vehicle routes on which triweekly service is performed shall receive $12 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles or major fraction thereof based on actual mileage: Provided further, That the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $2,160 per annum"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"SEC. 2. That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the annual salaries fixed by law for assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices and supervisory officials, whose compensation is $2,200 and less per annum, shall be increased $200, and those whose compensation is in excess of $2,200 shall be increased 5 per cent; that clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades, as follows: First grade, salary $1,000; second grade, salary $1,100; third grade, salary $1,200; fourth grade, salary $1,300; fifth grade, salary $1,400; sixth grade, salary $1,500. Clerks and carriers shall be promoted successively to the sixth grade: Provided, That on July 1, 1918, clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service who are in grades 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, under the act of March 2, 1907, as amended, shall pass automatically from such grades and the salaries they receive thereunder to the new grades, 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, respectively, with the salaries provided for such grades in this act: Provided further, That the salaries of railway postal clerks shall be graded as follows: Grade 1 at $1,100, grade 2 at $1,200, grade 3 at $1,300, grade 4 at $1,400, grade 5 at $1,500, grade 6 at $1,600, grade 7 at $1,700, grade 8 at $1,800, grade 9 at $1,900, grade 10 at $2,000.

"The Postmaster General shall classify and fix the salaries of railway postal clerks, under such regulations as he may prescribe, in the grades provided by law; and for the purpose of organization and establishing maximum grades to which promotions may be made successively, as hereinafter provided, he shall classify railway post offices, terminal railway post offices, and transfer offices with reference to their character and importance in three classes, with salary grades as follows:

"Class A, $1,100 to $1,400; class B, $1,100 to $1,500; and class C, $1,100 to $1,700. He may assign to the offices of division superintendents and chief clerks such railway postal clerks as may be necessary, and fix their salaries within the grades provided by law without regard to the classification of railway post offices: Provided, That on July 1, 1918, railway postal clerks shall pass automatically from the grades they are in and the salaries they receive under the act of August 24, 1912, to the corresponding grade, with salaries provided for in this act: Provided, That the classifications and increases of salaries provided for in this section shall not be continued beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919: Provided further, That the salary of clerks, carriers and railway postal clerks shall be increased during the fiscal year 1919, not more than $200: Provided further, That the classifications herein provided for shall not become effective until July 1, 1918: Provided further, That the salaries of such other employees fixed by law or paid from lump-sum appropriations provided for in this act who receive $800 per annum or less shall be increased 15 per cent per annum. Rural carriers assigned to horse-drawn vehicle routes now receiving a compensation of $1,200 or less per annum, exclusive of mileage allowance for miles on routes over 24 miles in length, shall receive, in addition thereto, 20 per cent of the amount of such compensation. Such increases shall not apply to the special assistant to the Attorney General appropriated for in this act and to postmasters at offices of the first, second and third classes: Provided further, That postmasters of the fourth class shall receive the same compensation as now provided by law, except that they shall receive 100 per cent of the cancellations of the first $80 or less per quarter: Provided further, That, if the compensation does not exceed $50 for any one quarter, fourth-class postmasters shall be allowed an increase of 20 per cent of the compensation allowed under existing law: Provided further, That no office shall be advanced to third class by reason of the temporary increases herein provided: Provided further, That hereafter substitute, temporary, or auxiliary clerks and letter carriers at first and second class post offices shall be paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to employees who receive a part of their pay from any outside sources under cooperative arrangement with the Post Office Department, or to employees who serve voluntarily or receive only a nominal compensation: And provided further, That the increased compensation, at the rate of 5 per cent and 10 per cent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, shall not be computed as salary in construing this section. So much as may be necessary for the increases provided for in this act is hereby appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 53: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 32 of the bill, in lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "assistant postmasters and other supervisory employees"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 32 of the bill, in line 16, strike out the words "April sixth" and insert in lieu thereof "June thirtieth"; and in line 18 strike out the words "which bids were received" and insert in lieu thereof "contracts entered into"; and in line 19 strike out the words "to the declaration of the present war" and insert in lieu thereof "June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seventeen"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 34 of the bill, in line 2, in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$300,000"; and in line 6, after the word "date," insert a period and strike out the remainder of the section; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 34 of the bill, in line 16, after the word "Department," insert "but suitable for the use of the Postal Service"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 35 of the bill, in line 5, after the word "positions," insert a period and strike out the remainder of the section; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 63: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 36 of the bill, in line 21, in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23, relating to the purchase of the pneumatic mail-tube systems: The conferees have been unable to agree.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, as follows:

On amendments 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, and 27: These amendments relate to items of compensation for a stated number of employees at stipulated salaries, plus temporary increases for the next fiscal year, provided in amendment 52, and the language inserted is for the purpose of making plain the legislative intent which made it necessary to increase the amounts to be appropriated therefor.

On amendments 2, 3, 5, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 30, 37, 46, and 51: These amendments also relate to the temporary increases for the next fiscal year for postal employees whose compensation is appropriated for in lump-sum allowances. The increases inserted by the Senate amendments are necessary to provide for the temporary increases proposed.

On amendment 8: Amendment 8 amends present law to enable postal employees entitled to compensatory time for Sunday or holiday service, if they so elect, to accept pay for overtime in lieu of compensatory time. It is deemed that such legislation is wise and in the interest of good service, since many employees entitled to compensatory service within the week following prefer to work rather than take the time off.

On amendments 13 and 15: Amendments 13 and 15 make permanent law an identical amendment which has been repeated in each appropriation bill for a number of years. These amendments will make unnecessary the repetition of the same language in future appropriation bills.

On amendment 14: Increasing the appropriation by $300,000 is made necessary by the increased cost for rent, light, and fuel in first, second, and third class post offices.

On amendment 19: The amendment agreed to does not increase the appropriation, but makes available $300,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

On amendment 20: This amendment is merely clerical.

On amendment 21: Amendment 21 makes immediately available for the present fiscal year $100,000 for mail messenger service.

On amendment 22: This amendment relates to postage on drop letters in the city of New York, from which the Senate conferees receded.

On amendment 24: Amendment 24 relates to the mail service on Lake Winnepesaukee, N. H. A similar item has been carried in a number of previous bills, which fixed the salary of the carrier because of the peculiar conditions attending the service.

On amendment 25: Amendment 25 is a change in language made necessary by the preceding amendment.

On amendment 28: The word "regular" is inserted so as to enable the department to employ temporary railway postal clerks during certain emergencies, and is inserted to make clearer the legislative intent.

On amendment 29: The increased amount is necessary because of additional demands upon the service provided for in this item.

On amendments 31 and 32: Amendment 31 is necessary because of an increase of $10,000 in the appropriation provided for in amendment 32, made necessary upon the statement of the Postmaster General that the unusual conditions require the additional amounts and is in the interest of good service.

On amendment 33: This amendment requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and determine fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of mail by urban and interurban electric railway common carriers, the same as is now the case with steam railways, and provides that after the rates are so fixed, pursuant to due notice and hearing, as is usually provided, it shall be unlawful for such carriers to refuse to perform the service at the rates so prescribed.

On amendment 34: Amendment 34 increases the appropriation for censorship of foreign mails made necessary because of the increased labor involved, and makes immediately available $200,000 for that purpose.

On amendment 35: This amendment is intended to prevent duplication in the censorship of mails from the military forces connected with the American expeditionary force.

On amendment 36: Amendment 36 increases the appropriation for the manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers due to the increased demands upon the department.

On amendments 38, 39, 40, 41, and 42: These amendments relate to the supply of sundry material for the Postal Service throughout the country, and the increases provided are necessary because of the rapid growth of the service and the unusual demands for material and supplies.

On amendment 43: Amendment 43 makes available additional appropriations necessary for material and supplies, and for $100,000 to be used by the Postmaster General for the installation and experiments with mail-distributing machines, particularly one that has been in operation in the Chicago post office and which is strongly commended by post-office officials in that city and by inspectors who have carefully investigated its possibilities and the economy of labor and expense.

On amendment 44: Amendment 44 changes the word "chairs" to "chains," to correct a clerical error.

On amendment 45: This amendment materially increasing the appropriation provided by the House is necessary to enable the department to purchase raw material and better equip the shops in the city of Washington for the manufacture of mail bags, mail containers, etc. Recent bids disclosed that the cost for this material in the open market has increased approximately 100 per cent. The Post Office Department believes that with additional funds they could manufacture them on their own account with economy to the Government.

On amendments 47 and 48: Amendments 47 and 48 modify a provision heretofore carried in each appropriation bill and provides that no part of the fund for inland transportation by star routes shall be expended for star-route service which is already served by Rural Delivery Service, unless the services of a qualified rural carrier can not be secured, and makes the provision permanent law.

On amendments 49 and 50: These amendments relate to the compensation for rural delivery carriers. In substance, they include provisions contained in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and provide that rural carriers on horse-drawn vehicle routes shall receive $24 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage, the same as is now provided for routes in excess of 30 miles in length. On triweekly routes $12 per mile per annum for each mile in excess of 24 miles is allowed the carrier. The present law respecting the compensation for motor-route carriers, who furnish their own automobiles, on routes not less than 50 miles in length is amended to increase their compensation from a maximum of $1,800 to a maximum of $2,160. The amendment by the Senate that a carrier may use such character of vehicle on horse-drawn routes as may be approved by the local postmaster is stricken out.

On amendment 52: Amendment 52 relates to temporary increases during the fiscal year for employees of the Postal Service, and, in substance, contains similar provisions to those contained in House bill 9414 recently passed by the House, except that the salaries of assistant postmasters and clerks and carriers in first and second class post offices, railway postal clerks from grade 1 to grade 10, inclusive, and supervisory officials, shall be increased not more than $200 during the next fiscal year. Supervisory officials receiving in excess of $2,200 receive an increase of 5 per cent. All other employees of the Postal Service whose compensation does not exceed $800 per annum increased 20 per cent; those who receive from $800 to $1,500 per annum are increased 15 per cent. The salaries of rural carriers not in excess of $1,200 are increased 20 per cent. No increases are provided for postmasters at first, second, and third class offices, but postmasters of the fourth class are allowed an additional increase of 100 per cent on cancellations up to $80 per quarter instead of $50 as at present, except that those whose compensation does not exceed $50 per quarter are increased 20 per cent. Provision is made, however, that such temporary increases shall not have the effect of advancing the office to third class. The provision relating to advance in grades of clerks and carriers and railway postal clerks is included, but limited to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. Provision is also made that substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks and carriers shall be paid at the rate of 40 cents per hour instead of 35 cents and 40 cents as at present, making the rate uniform.

On amendment 53: Amendment 53 extends to watchmen, messengers, and laborers in first and second class post offices and to railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer clerks the privileges of the 8 in 10 hour law, and also extends to railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices the privileges of compensatory time as now provided for clerks and carriers who work under the same conditions. The provision in the amendment extending compensatory time to assistant postmasters and supervisory employees is stricken out.

On amendment 54: Amendment 54 lodges with the Postmaster General the authority to investigate conditions arising from contracts on star route, screen wagon, and other vehicle service, and contracts for envelopes, blanks, and blank books and the Official Postal Guide entered into prior to June 30, 1917, with a view to determining whether or not any adjustment should be made in the contracts due to the increased cost for materials or services because of the war and whether the facts disclose the necessity to adjust the same for materials or services to be furnished after the approval of this act. With the consent of the contractor and his bondsmen the Postmaster General may cancel such contracts.

On amendment 55: Amendment 55 makes effective to certain employees in the Post Office Department the 5 and 10 per cent increase provided in the present appropriation bill which by reason of construction is denied them and is identical with a similar provision which has heretofore passed the House.

On amendment 56: Amendment 56 permits the Postmaster General to accept liberty bonds in lieu of corporate or personal surety for contractors, officers, and employees in the Postal Service and is identical with a similar provision which has heretofore passed the House.

On amendment 57: Amendment 57 relates to the same subject matter contained in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and permits experimentation by the Postmaster General in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities as he may select. The sum of $300,000 is made available out of unexpended appropriations for the Postal Service for the purpose of such experimentation, and direction is given that results shall be reported to Congress.

On amendment 58: Amendment 58 is almost identical with a similar provision in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and permits the Secretary of War to turn over to the Postmaster General without charge such aeroplanes and automobiles, or parts thereof, as are unsuitable for the War Department but suitable for the Postal Service.

On amendment 59: Amendment 59 authorizes employees and substitute employees of the Postal Service who enter the military or naval service to be restored after their honorable discharge from such service to the positions which they formerly occupied in the Postal Service at the salary to which they would have been promoted provided they are physically and mentally qualified. The provision in the Senate amendment which permitted members of the immediate family of such employee, or others connected with the expeditionary forces in Europe, to mail certain packages is stricken out.

On amendment 60: Amendment 60 proposed by the Senate is stricken out.

On amendment 61: Amendment 61 permits the Postmaster General to adjust claims of postmasters for loss by fire, burglary, or other cause, of war-savings stamps and thrift stamps, etc., which under the law they are required to keep on hand.

On amendment 62: Amendment 62 repeals existing law authorizing the payment of $5 to postmasters for each recruit secured and accepted in the Army, Navy, or Marine service.

On amendments 63 and 64: Amendments 63 and 64 are the same as sections 9 and 10 of H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, increasing the amount any one person may deposit in a postal savings bank from $1,000 with interest and $1,000 without interest as provided under present law to $2,500 with interest. The provision as passed the House was for $3,000 with interest.

Amendment 64 permits the purchase of postal savings stamps in denominations of 10 cents to be affixed to a card and when it amounts to $1 may be deposited as a postal savings account or redeemed in cash.

On amendment 65: Amendment 65 is a clerical one made necessary by the addition of certain sections to the bill.

On amendment 23: Amendment 23 relates to the purchase of the pneumatic-tube mail service. The conferees have been unable to agree respecting the provisions of this amendment.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Merely for the information of the Members interested, is the pneumatic-tube service purchase agreed to by the conferees or disagreed to?

Mr. MOON. No, sir; it is not agreed to; and I hope, in the interest of justice, it never can be. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point is to have the announcement made, so that the Members who differ with the gentleman might be here.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 11284.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11284) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11284, with Mr. COX in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11284, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], who reported the bill and has charge of it.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is very similar to previous lighthouse bills that have passed the House. It differs from former legislation only in one or two particulars, and perhaps I ought to refer briefly to those changes.

I desire to call attention first to section 6 of the bill, commonly known as the retirement provision. Section 6 provides—

That hereafter all officers and employees engaged in the field service or on vessels of the Lighthouse Service, except persons continuously employed in district offices or shops, who shall have reached the age of 65 years, after having been 30 years in the active service of the Government, may at their option be retired from further performance of duty; and all such officers and employees who shall have reached the age of 70 years shall be compulsorily retired from further performance of duty: Provided, That the annual compensation of persons so retired shall be a sum equal to one-fortieth of the average annual pay received for the last five years of service for each year of active service in the Lighthouse Service or in a department or branch of the Government having a retirement system, not to exceed in any case thirty-fortieths of such average annual pay received: Provided further, That such retirement pay shall not include any amount on account of subsistence or other allowance.

Gentlemen of the committee will recall that in the Sixty-third Congress the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service were consolidated under the name of the Coast Guard. At that time men in the Revenue-Cutter Service were already enjoying the advantages of a retirement law, and by the act consolidating the two branches of the service the benefits of the retirement provision were extended to the men in the Life-Saving Service. By section 6 of this bill we attempt to place the men in the Lighthouse Service on an equality with the men in the Coast Guard.

This bill provides in substance for retirement of employees at the ages specified in section 6 at 75 per cent of their former salary. That works out in this way: A man who has received a salary of $800 for the past five years will get thirty-fortieths of the salary upon retirement, or $600. If he is now receiving a salary of $600 per annum, he will upon retirement receive thirty-fortieths of that sum, or $450.

Now as to the number of men who will be affected by this retirement provision——

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. Certainly.

Mr. LONDON. On page 4, line 21, I find the expression "one-fortieth of the average pay."

Mr. DOREMUS. For each year of service.

Mr. LONDON. I did not understand the meaning of that.

Mr. DOREMUS. If he served 30 years he will get thirty-fortieths of his former pay. There are at present in the Lighthouse Service 133 men who would be affected by the retirement provision.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will be glad to.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there a maximum period of service required before he can be retired?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the maximum, and what is the minimum?

Mr. DOREMUS. If the employee has reached the age of 65 years and has seen 30 years of continuous service he may be retired at his option. If he has reached the age of 70 years he will be compelled to retire.

Mr. MADDEN. I know; but how many years of service must he have before he can be retired on age?

Mr. DOREMUS. If he reaches the age of 70 there is no provision as to length of service. If he reaches the age of 65 he must have had 30 years of service in order to be retired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I take it from reading this bill that there is no provision for retirement except for the age limit. In other words, there is no provision similar to the Coast Guard provision, by which a retiring board may retire a man for physical disabilities. He must reach a certain age before he can get the benefit of this retirement act?

Mr. DOREMUS. That is correct.

Mr. HICKS. Did the committee consider the idea of having in this bill a provision similar to the provision in the Coast Guard law providing for retirement for disability?

Mr. DOREMUS. My recollection is that that matter was not discussed by the committee or recommended by the department.

Mr. HICKS. I see that the retirement age is 65. In the Army it is 64 and 62. Just why was the differential made between the two services?

Mr. DOREMUS. We retained the years specified in section 6 on the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce and of the Commissioner of Lighthouses, who, of course, are familiar with the men in the service, who know their ages and are better qualified than we are to pass upon the question of when the retirement provision should go into effect.

Mr. LONDON. Coming back to the expression "one-fortieth," on page 4, line 21, I was misled by the language of that section, and upon rereading it I find it is extremely difficult to get at the real meaning of that proviso, which reads:

Provided, That the annual compensation of persons so retired shall be a sum equal to one-fortieth of the average annual pay received for the last five years of service for each year of active service in the Lighthouse Service or in a department or branch of the Government having a retirement system, not to exceed in any case thirty-fortieths of such average annual pay received.

What we really want to say is that the annual compensation shall be equal to the multiple of one-fortieth by the number of years of active service.

Mr. DOREMUS. If I understand the gentleman correctly, we have reached the same result. I think the gentleman will understand the matter when we put it in this way: For over 50 years the average annual salary of the lighthouse keepers has been $600 per year. Now we will assume that one of these keepers has reached the age of 65 years and has seen 30 years of service. He is retired, and he gets thirty-fortieths of his previous pay. One-fortieth would be $15, and thirty-fortieths would be $450.

Mr. LONDON. I understand the computation, but I speak of the language "for each year of active service," in line 23, page 4, which is so far removed from the expression "the annual compensation of persons so retired shall be" that it is almost impossible to understand the meaning of the entire section.

Mr. DOREMUS. It works out very plainly. All you have to do is to get one-fortieth of the average salary for the last five years and multiply that by the years of service.

Mr. LONDON. What we mean is that the annual compensation will be a sum equal to one-fortieth of the average annual pay received for the last five years multiplied by the number of years of service.

Mr. DOREMUS. It means the same thing. Mr. Chairman, there are 50 men in the Lighthouse Service to-day who are 70 years old or more and who have seen 30 years or more of service. There are 27 who are 70 years old or more and have seen less than 30 years of service. There are 26 who are over 65 years of age and less than 70, with 30 years of service or more. There are 30 who are over 65 years of age and less than 70 years of age, with less than 30 years of service. That makes 133 men who will be affected by this proposed legislation if it becomes a law. Assuming that the average annual salary of these men is $800 per annum, it is estimated that this provision will cost the Government approximately $106,000 per year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why was not the language in the Coast Guard retirement bill followed in this case? The allowance there on retirement is three-fourths of the annual pay, is it not?

Mr. DOREMUS. That is 75 per cent, and this works out identically the same with reference to the men who are retired after 30 years of service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This way of stating it is a little more involved, and I was wondering why you did not come at it directly.

Mr. DOREMUS. Under this bill it is possible that a man who has reached the age of 70 years and who has not seen 30 years of service will not get 75 per cent of his former pay.

Now, I desire to refer briefly to the reasons which actuated the committee in making this recommendation. We found that the work in which these men are engaged is in many instances of a very hazardous and dangerous character. We found that in 1917 there were 160 cases of the saving of life and property by these lighthouse keepers. Two hundred and thirteen employees were injured, and 12 lost their lives in this work.

We found ample precedents not only in our own laws but in the laws of Great Britain, France, Holland, Germany, New Zealand, Belgium, and Sweden for this legislation.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. If this bill passes, it retires these lighthouse keepers on the pay fixed in the law?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. If this class of Government employees are retired on pay, is there any reason why all Government employees should not be retired on pay? Before the gentleman answers that question let me state that personally I am opposed to both propositions. I am opposed to retiring these lighthouse employees and all other Government employees on pay. They seek the employment. Let them stand the consequences.

Mr. DOREMUS. If my friend from Missouri will read section 6, he will find in it no precedent for extending retirement with pay to all men in the Government service, because he will find it expressly excludes those who have been continuously employed in district offices or shops. It applies only to those who by reason of their employment are obliged to risk the hazards attendant upon the saving of life and property. The committee could see no material distinction between the character of service performed by these men and the service performed by men in the life-saving service and in the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Section 7 of the bill increases the salaries of the superintendents of lighthouses from $2,400 to $3,000 per annum. The Secretary of Commerce recommended that these salaries be placed at $3,600. The committee, however, believed that $3,000 would be fair and equitable as to these men. This would apply to all the superintendents except the one in New York City, whose salary is now fixed by law at $3,600 per annum.

Section 8 makes the average pay of the lighthouse keepers $700 per annum. When I state to the committee that the average annual salary of these men for over half a century has been $600 a year, and that during all that time there has been no change whatever, I think I have stated a sufficient argument in favor of this small increase in their salaries.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ESCH. The actual average was only $559 per year.

Mr. DOREMUS. I am glad to be corrected. My colleague on the committee states that, as a matter of fact, the average annual pay has been only $559.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How long has that been the salary?

Mr. DOREMUS. For 51 years, without any change.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. MERRITT. Is the salary in addition to the living expenses?

Mr. DOREMUS. I neglected to say that there is a provision in the bill, section 3, which increases the amount allowed for rations per day from 30 cents to 45 cents. Forty-five cents is the amount now allowed in the Coast Guard. We propose to make it the same in the Lighthouse Service.

Mr. MERRITT. If a man has a family, he does not get any per diem for the members of that family?

Mr. DOREMUS. No; that is all he gets.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to two or three paragraphs of the bill which were not brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Michigan. Under the paragraph entitled "general service," on page 1 of the bill, we provide for an appropriation of $700,000 for the construction, purchasing, and equipping of lighthouse tenders and light vessels to replace vessels worn out in the service in several districts. There are three vessels in the Lighthouse Service that are so old that it no longer pays the Government to repair them, and, in fact, their further employment by the Government in the Lighthouse Service is not justified. For instance, if this provision remains in, appropriating money for the construction of new light vessels, it will enable us to supplant the John Rogers, an old wooden side-wheeled vessel that was constructed as far back as 1883. It would permit us to replace the Holly, a wooden vessel and a side wheeler, built in 1881. It would also permit us to replace the Jessamine, a vessel 35 years old. I think that no argument is needed to convince the House of the necessity of making this appropriation for these replacements. The building program for the Lighthouse Service ought to be two vessels a year. There are now 119 vessels in the establishment, 58 tenders and 68 light vessels. Due to depreciation and hard service two of these vessels on an average ought to be scrapped a year. So unless we make the appropriation to restore these taken out of the service the service will be rendered ineffective.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. WALSH. What type of vessel can be built for $200,000; will it be the modern tender that the department is building or will it be a wooden craft?

Mr. ESCH. There will be no wooden craft; they will be modern steel vessels after the type that has been established by the Lighthouse Service itself. After years of experience they have developed their own type of vessel.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is aware that there is a great demand for steel and a great increase in the cost of shipbuilding. I would like to ask if the committee took these facts into consideration in fixing the sum at $200,000.

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman will notice in the bill we are considering, the $200,000 is eliminated.

Mr. WALSH. I was following the gentleman's remarks from the report and I had not noticed that.

Mr. ESCH. We have changed the bill and made an omnibus provision of $760,000 for vessels needed in the Lighthouse Service. It may be, owing to the increased cost of both material and labor, that three vessels can not be built out of the total appropriation, but those in charge will do the best they can.

Mr. WALSH. That is allowing an increase of a little over $50,000 to each vessel.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that that is sufficient?

Mr. ESCH. I greatly doubt it. I remember that the Coast Guard Service had an appropriation three years ago of some $300,000 for a revenue cutter. It was not built at the time, and I understand that before they got it constructed it cost $700,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In relation to the inquiry propounded by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will state that the Secretary of Commerce suggested that the estimated cost was obtained from the War Industrial Board, that being the most practical estimate that could be applied to this measure.

Mr. WALSH. But, of course, these estimates were in December, 1917, and the gentleman is aware of the great increase of cost since then.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; but I was only endeavoring to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that we endeavored to get the best evidence obtainable to determine the cost of the vessels.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the committee has not acted without accurate information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state to what extent these old vessels are sent outside?

Mr. ESCH. They are confined practically to the harbors in the wintertime on account of floating ice.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are three vessels which the committee desire to renew—the Gardenia, the John Rogers, and the Mistletoe. The Jessamine is an old vessel, and I know something about her; but I wanted to know if any of these old vessels are sent outside into the open sea. There is a good deal of open-sea work done.

Mr. ESCH. I doubt it; I think the John Rogers does some work up around Long Island Sound.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Such vessels ought not to be sent out.

Mr. ESCH. No; it would endanger the life of the officers and crew.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Anyone who follows the progress of the Lighthouse Service knows that we are using some extremely old vessels that ought to be replaced by modern vessels, not only for efficiency of service but for the safety of the lives of the officers and men on board. My recollection is that there was an appropriation of $200,000 in a previous bill. Did that become a law?

Mr. ESCH. That was the act of August 28, 1916. It is a law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was for vessels on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ESCH. There were two provided for, as I recollect, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A lighthouse tender was lost out there.

Mr. ESCH. There was one lost off the New England coast early this winter. She was a lightship, and no trace of her has been found. Vessel and crew both are lost, so we have to constantly supply new vessels, because of obsolescence and because of loss by hazards of the sea.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My recollection is that in the bill we provided for certain tenders on the Pacific coast, and that that was held up here for some time and did not get through. Does the gentleman recall that?

Mr. ESCH. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported out the bill, which became the act of August 28, 1916, making provisions for these two vessels, but it was some time before the Committee on Appropriations made the necessary appropriations to carry that out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the Commissioner of Lighthouses suggest this $760,000 will be sufficient, so far as new construction is concerned, to bring the service up to date?

Mr. ESCH. He believes it may not be sufficient, in view of the high prices, to build three vessels to supplant the three that I have mentioned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He probably could not build three vessels for that price now.

Mr. ESCH. No; but they want to do as much as they can and meet the emergency as soon as possible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the committee thinks this is the best it can do.

Mr. ESCH. This is the best we can do. Another item that may be called to the attention of the House is contained in section 2, on page 3, with reference to allowing the Government to pay for subsistence and the traveling expenses of teachers to the isolated dwelling houses of the lighthouse keepers in certain places. The State of Maine is now doing something in this direction, the State paying the expense of the schoolteachers, but not the traveling expenses and the subsistence. We thought it would be wise to have that appropriation made, and if made it will entail possible not more than $4,000 per annum.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to my colleague that the State of Maine also pays the cost of the textbooks.

Mr. ESCH. The State of Maine does that. In England, in the British Isles generally, they have a very generous provision so that the children of the lighthouse keepers are educated at the expense of the State. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] has taken up quite fully the retirement provision, and I concur in every argument that he has presented in support of that proposition. I wish to supplement what he has said in support of section 7, providing for an increase in the pay of the superintendents of lighthouses. We have changed the designation of these officials. They are now called lighthouse inspectors. In this bill we wish to designate them as superintendents of lighthouses, which is the old designation which obtained the early half of the last century. We increased their pay from $2,400 to $3,000. This is a very modest increase, when we consider the capacity and ability and responsibility of these officials. On an average they have 1,000 miles of seacoast under their jurisdiction. They have about 280 men under their charge. They have Government property of a value of about $3,000,000. The annual disbursements are something like $300,000, and they have on an average seven vessels under their charge. Men who have such great responsibilities, who have so many men under them and so many millions of dollars of property under their control, ought certainly to be paid a wage higher than the captains of the vessels under their jurisdiction. Yet, as the situation is to-day with a pay of $2,400, there are officials in the various lighthouse districts, captains of vessels, and so forth, who get more pay than the district superintendents. Under these conditions we feel that the increase of only $600 to these deserving officials is entirely justified.

These men must be experienced in navigation, they must be practical navigators, they must have a knowledge of engineering, and practically every one of the lighthouse inspectors have had some education along engineering lines, and they have come up from other mechanical or engineering or scientific departments of the Government. Some of them have come to the Lighthouse Service from the Coast and Geodetic Survey. They must be capable of superintending the construction of a lighthouse in their district or any other engineering work of that kind. They must have a broad knowledge and large experience, and for these reasons we feel justified in asking for this very modest increase.

Mr. ROBBINS. What increase does the bill carry over the present?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] stated that the increase due to section 6, which is the retirement provision, is $106,000.

Mr. DOREMUS. Estimated at $106,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. What is the increase in pay in addition to that?

Mr. ESCH. The increase of these superintendents of lighthouses would amount to $7,800.

Mr. ROBBINS. And that is all the increase in the bill?

Mr. ESCH. There is an increase in the lighthouse keepers' pay from a maximum of $600, where it is now, to $700, as contained in the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. And there are how many of those?

Mr. ESCH. There are about 1,800 lighthouses in the United States and its Territories.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] explaining so clearly the provisions of this bill. I agree that some of the increases of this measure are justified, but I do not agree as to the increases of the salaries of these inspectors. In the report their qualifications are given, but they omit to mention what I think is also an important qualification for inspector of lighthouses, and that is that he shall be to some extent a competent and astute politician. Now they are paid $2,400 a year except in the New York district, and he is paid, I understand, $3,000.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. In view of the remark the gentleman has just made, I want to ask for information, if he has ever been an inspector of a lighthouse?

Mr. WALSH. No; I have never been inspector of a lighthouse, never having applied for that position, but if I had I have some doubt whether I could have qualified in this latter respect, especially during the past six years. Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill carries a small increase for the lighthouse keepers in this service from $600 to $700, and I think a small increase in the ration allowance. They are the men who have the responsibility; they are the men who do the work and who are required to be on the spot; and they are the men who feel more keenly the increased demands upon them to raise a family or to live properly in these times of extravagant prices for the ordinary necessities of life. We give them a paltry increase, I think, of $100 or thereabouts, a year, and I say it is hardly a sufficient increase for these men who do this work, who have to be on the job during the lonely hours of the night to see that the lights are kept burning and the danger signals sounded, many of them located in positions where the ordinary man would not accept employment or appointment to that position for three times, yes, five times the salary, and yet we come in here and increase them but $100 a year, while to these inspectors, who have a roving commission and whose traveling expenses are paid, at least within their districts, who can live in comfort, if not in luxury, but who can live upon their salary, we grant them an increase of $600 a year by this bill. I submit they are in that class of Government employees who ought not to take advantage of this war situation and ask and expect this Congress to increase their compensation at this time. I say, Mr. Chairman, it is a shame upon the Federal service that these higher-paid officials, getting $2,400 to $2,500 a year and $3,000 a year, should at this time, in the midst of this great war, when we are laying heavy burdens upon the taxpayers of this country, expect us to increase their salaries.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. DOREMUS. I understand the superintendent of the lighthouse district in the gentleman's district lives in Boston.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir; in or near Boston; just outside of Boston, I think.

Mr. DOREMUS. Would the gentleman expect him to live on less than $3,000 a year in these times?

Mr. WALSH. Well, we have got hundreds of Federal employees living in Boston, and if he can not live on $2,400 why do not we increase all Federal employees to $3,000?

Mr. DOREMUS. Does the gentleman know that practically everyone in the public service to-day is having a hard time to make both ends meet?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly; from Federal judges down; but some can economize more easily than others.

Mr. DOREMUS. And is it not a fact thousands are leaving the Government service on that account?

Mr. WALSH. Thousands are leaving certain branches of the Government service and going into other branches of the Government service, or indirectly in the Government service, because private establishments engaged on Government work are paying higher wages; but I submit it is no reason why the Government should embark upon a wholesale program of increasing Government salaries while we are in this war, particularly as to the higher paid officials. I have said several times before that it is time that we evince some spirit of economy in making these appropriations for compensation and salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes additional?

Mr. ESCH. Another five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. On the contrary, in many bills that come before the House carrying appropriations for Federal employees constantly we are met with the plea that we should increase the compensation of men getting twenty-four hundred dollars and more per annum. Mr. Chairman, I fear before this struggle is over that many of us who have yielded in many instances to these pleas and arguments will regret that we did not go slower when acting on their demands and requests but had attempted to conserve the resources of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. The legislative and executive bill carried an increase of $120 up to $2,000——

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. And now it is proposed here to increase, as the gentleman says, these men $500 or $600——

Mr. WALSH. Six hundred dollars for the inspectors.

Mr. FOSTER. And the poor lighthouse keeper gets $600 and it increases him $120?

Mr. WALSH. A hundred and twenty dollars or thereabouts. Talk about responsibility! The responsibility is not greater now than it was before; but I think the responsibility of the light keeper who is charged with the light, or the man upon the light vessel miles out at sea, during these past few days has increased greatly, and I should think——

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. ESCH. As to the increase of duties of these officials, I wish to state that 1,200 employees of the Lighthouse Service are now called into the military service and are serving under the Army or the Navy.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; because the Lighthouse Service is part of the Coast Guard, which under the law during war times is turned over to the jurisdiction of the Navy Department.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman is mistaken; the Lighthouse Service is not part of the new Coast Guard, but it is the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. WALSH. I am in error as to that; the Lighthouse Service is not in the Coast Guard; but if men in the Lighthouse Service are being called to military or naval service what sort of a substitute are you going to get in their place at this rate of pay? What sort of efficiency, what degree of responsibility, can you expect when you hold out to a man a salary of $700 to become practically a hermit in a lighthouse?

Mr. FOSTER. Living on that little salary, would he not be glad to be called into the service?

Mr. WALSH. I should imagine perhaps he might, at least you would have hard work to attract him from other service to take a position like that. But the service must be maintained, and especially during these war times.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee had, in considering this bill, decided to increase these $600 employees to $900—yes, or to $1,000—I submit that it would have been justifiable under the facts and under existing conditions, but when we give them the small increase, and then as to the inspectors—who apparently dislike the title of "inspector," which has been borne by them for years, and who now prefer to be known as "superintendents of lighthouses"—we increase the salary by $600. That is not in keeping with the treatment accorded to employees in other branches of the service, nor is it in keeping with the precedents heretofore set by this Congress in dealing with compensation of Federal officials. And I trust the committee will not seriously object to an amendment increasing the salaries of the light keepers. The section of the country from which I come, as well as the sections from which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] come, have many of these employees, either upon light vessels or in lighthouses. We recognize that it would be impossible for the great water commerce of this country to be conducted safely or profitably unless we have an efficient Lighthouse Service. And I trust that the House will be willing to increase these lower-paid officials and, if necessary, sacrifice the increase granted to the inspectors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, the sea with its vast expanse, and mighty distances stretching to the far corners of the earth, appeals to the imagination and envelops commerce with the cloak of romance. I congratulate the committee for bringing forward a measure so meritorious as this Lighthouse bill, and I hope they will soon bring into Congress the Coast Guard bill, another measure deserving of favorable consideration.

The Long Island district which I have the honor to represent has a coast line exceeded by only a few districts in the United States. Everything which pertains to the sea and which affects the men whose calling takes them upon the waters is of vital interest to many of the people whose commission I bear. Having always been interested personally in our splendid Live-Saving, Revenue-Cutter, and Lighthouse Service, with the indulgence of the House I desire to say a few words in reference to the Coast Guard bill soon to be considered, which includes the provisions of a bill introduced by myself some time ago.

Encircling my district like a chain of sentry posts on the frontiers of the deep, are 28 life-saving stations of the Coast Guard and 20 lighthouses and 2 lightships; the one, beacons to warn mariners of the dangers of the coast and aid them in the navigation of our seas and bays; the other, the great agent of mercy alleviating the sufferings and perhaps saving the lives of shipwrecked voyagers. Both are for the protection of life and property; both mitigate the perils of the sea; both are essential to the mighty commerce whose rapid increase heralds the reestablishment of our Nation as one of the great maritime powers of the world and which again, as in days gone by, will ply the seven seas under the American flag.

The Coast Guard is a union of the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, created by act of Congress approved January 28, 1915.

At the second session of the First Congress, in response to the need felt for a coast patrol to enforce the customs laws, as well as for an armed force for the protection of the seacoast—there being no navy at that time—there was established in 1790 the Revenue-Cutter Service. With the growth of the Nation, in order to properly care for the constantly increasing requirements of our maritime interests, additional duties were successively added to the service, until at the time of the passage of the Coast Guard act this service had become a most important branch of our establishment, specializing in practically all governmental maritime activities.

The Life-Saving Service does not owe its origin to a single legislative act, but is the result of gradual growth, formed by a series of enactments dating back to 1848. Until 1871 the work of this service was desultory, and while the work of rescuing life and property from shipwreck was carried forward, the results were not satisfactory. In 1871 a well organized life-saving system was inaugurated, which was administered in conjunction with the Revenue-Cutter Service until 1878 when Congress established the Life-Saving Service as a separate unit. With the enlargement of both branches of the service their respective fields of action overlapped to some extent and supplemented each other in the work of conservation of life and property. To bring about closer cooperation and increased efficiency, Congress, by act of January 28, 1915, united the two services in one organization known as the United States Coast Guard. Under the provisions of this act the Coast Guard "shall constitute a part of the military forces of the United States and shall operate under the Treasury Department in time of peace and operate as a part of the Navy in time of war, or when the President shall so direct."

While it is difficult to enumerate all the duties performed by this important service, for it is essentially an emergency service, the following are the principal activities of the Coast Guard:

1. Rendering assistance to vessels in distress and saving life and property.
2. Destruction or removal of wrecks, derelicts, and other floating dangers to navigation.
3. Extending medical aid to American vessels engaged in deep-sea fisheries.
4. Protection of the customs revenue.
5. Operating as a part of the Navy in time of war or when the President shall direct.
6. Enforcement of law and regulations governing anchorage of vessels in navigable waters.
7. Enforcement of law relating to quarantine and neutrality.
8. Suppression of mutinies on merchant vessels.
9. Enforcement of navigation and other laws governing merchant vessels and motor boats.
10. Enforcement of law to provide for safety of life on navigable waters during regattas and marine parades.
11. Protection of game and the seal and other fisheries in Alaska, etc.
12. Enforcement of sponge-fishing law.
13. International ice patrol of the Grand Banks.

It seems to be generally accepted that the Coast Guard should be called upon by all the great departments of the Government for special work of a maritime character for which no other vessels are especially maintained.

During all periods of the year and at such times as least to interfere with the emergent duties of a civil nature, a rigid system of military discipline and training is maintained to fit the personnel for the duty of operating as a part of the Navy at any time, as the law requires. This function of the Coast Guard has always been of value, since in all wars to which the United States has been a party, the Government has had at hand an auxiliary force, properly disciplined and trained, ready to become a part of the regular naval forces as occasion required. This attribute is now the paramount function of the Coast Guard, as all its facilities are now being employed in the prosecution of the existing war.

Upon the declaration of war on April 6, 1917, the Coast Guard with all its personnel and equipment came under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, and the record made in the last 14 months is most commendable. The service was at once placed upon a war basis, additional men enlisted to fill vacancies, vessels equipped, stations brought up to the highest degree of efficiency, and the lines of coastal communication extended. To perfect the patrol system, there were constructed 750 miles of overhead telephone wires and 300 miles of submarine cables. By these additions and improvements immediate communication may be had between any point on the Atlantic coast and Washington. The present personnel consists of 229 commissioned officers and 5,000 warrant officers and enlisted men. There are 273 stations equipped with life-saving apparatus on the coasts and on the shores of the Great Lakes. The service has 21 seagoing cutters, with 5 more authorized, and about 25 smaller vessels. In a general way there are two kinds of units in the Coast Guard—ships and stations; the ships corresponding to the units of the former Revenue-Cutter Service and the stations corresponding to the units of the former Life-Saving Service. The personnel consists of commissioned officers, warrant officers, petty officers, and the enlisted men. The commissioned officers are captains and lieutenants who are line officers, engineer officers of corresponding rank, superintendents who were transferred from the Life-Saving Service, and constructors. The warrant officers are master's mates, boatswains, keepers, gunners, carpenters, and machinists. The petty officers include masters at arms, No. 1 surfmen, electricians, yeomen, wheelmen, quartermasters, oilers, coxswains, baymen, and so forth. Then come the enlisted men who are not petty officers, seamen, surfmen, firemen, cooks, and so forth. Enlisted men with the rating of surfmen, petty officers with the rating of No. 1 surfmen, and warrant officers of the grade of keeper are usually assigned to Coast Guard stations for life-saving duties.

In connection with the Coast Guard Academy, at New London, Conn., there has been established a recruiting and training station where recruits are enlisted and given a three months' course of intensive training, both on shore and at sea. Last September, six of the Coast Guard cutters were thoroughly outfitted and equipped with larger guns than those used in peace times, and these vessels are now operating in the submarine zone under the command of Admiral Sims. Five naval training stations and two naval aviation stations are under the charge of Coast Guard officers. In addition, two officers of this service, under the provisions of the espionage act have been made captains of the port and given authority over all merchant vessels entering and leaving the harbors of New York and Norfolk. The Coast Guard is also enforcing the regulations in reference to the loading of high explosives in the port of New York, and every ammunition ship is now anchored and her cargo taken on board under the immediate direction and supervision of a commissioned Coast Guard officer assisted by armed guards to insure rigid compliance with the regulations. The waterways between Lakes Superior and Huron through which most of the iron ore consigned for war purposes is transported is under the patrol and protection of the Coast Guard.

In every way in which service can be rendered in the prosecution of the war, this branch of our fighting force is performing its duty, fully and effectively. Let me pay my respects to the captain commandant of the service, Capt. Ellsworth P. Bertholf, an officer of wide experience and sound executive judgment, and to all the officers who are doing such splendid work in maintaining the service on a high plane of efficiency. I want to pay a tribute to the enlisted men who face the dangers of war and the perils of the sea with courage and determination. Their loyalty and patriotism have never been questioned, their valor and heroism never doubted, and they merit the highest praise for their unflinching response to duty, for their self-sacrificing devotion to their hazardous calling, and for their bravery in times of disaster, which endows their perilous vocation with the noblest attributes of humanity—the saving of lives and the ministering to those in distress.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order. I understand the discussion is to be confined to the bill, but I want to speak on a matter separate from that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to present to the House a very interesting communication which I received in this morning's mail. A group known as the Czecho-Slovak Workingmen's Council, writing from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, tell me that the governor of the State of Iowa has issued an order that no language other than English shall be used in public; that no language other than English shall be used in communications on the telephone or in places of public worship.

In a most remarkable document, a parallel to which can not be found except in the Middle Ages, he says that while freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution and the State constitution, it is not a guaranty of the right to use a language other than the official language of the country. And since English is the official language of the State and of the United States no other language shall be used. Then he proceeds to say in his proclamation:

Each person is guaranteed freedom to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, but this guaranty does not protect him in the use of a foreign language when he can as well express his thought in English, nor entitle the person who can not speak or understand the English language to employ a foreign language, when to do so tends, in time of national peril, to create discord among neighbors and citizens or to disturb the peace and quiet of the community.

Later on he says, and I will incorporate the entire proclamation in my remarks:

Therefore the following rules shall obtain in Iowa during the war:
First. English should and must be the only medium of instruction in public, private, denominational, or other similar schools.
Second. Conversation in public places, on trains, and over the telephones should be in the English language.
Third. All public addresses should be in the English language.
Fourth. Let those who can not speak or understand the English language conduct their religious worship in their homes.

Now, it is evident that some public officials suffer from that peculiar form of insanity which comes about with war. To prohibit a man from using the language which he knows, and the only language in which he can express his thoughts, is to seal his lips and deprive him of the right to speak. To prevent a person from worshipping God in any language except the official language would be to destroy a fundamental right, an elementary right, which lies at the very basis of this Republic.

Where do these men get their authority? Where do they get their law? Where, in all history, has any free country issued a similar ukase?

The protest to me is sent by a group of Czecho-Slovaks, or Bohemians. We know that the Bohemians have sent a regiment from this country to the front in France. They are the noblest and bravest fighters that the allies have. They are fighting not only for the United States but they are intensely interested in the problems confronting the small nationalities of Austria-Hungary. To them the war is a holy war, a war of emancipation for their own people. They left the security of the United States, those who were not of draft age, in order to get to the western front to fight the fight of nations. These men are prohibited by the silly order of an unthinking official from using the only language in which they can appeal to one another.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Has the gentleman verified the correctness of that report? I am surprised to hear that any governor of a State would issue a proclamation prohibiting the speaking of anything but the English tongue. I can not believe a report of that kind is even accurate.

Mr. LONDON. I am glad the gentleman has that opinion. I have seen it in the public print, and the letter to which I have referred incloses a clipping from one of the newspapers in Iowa, which attempts to defend the governor, and gives his proclamation in full.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that supposed to be signed by the governor of the State?

Mr. LONDON. It is signed by the governor, W. L. Harding, at Des Moines, Iowa, and bears the date the 23d day of May, 1918. I assume that the newspapers have not given it sufficient publicity, because probably most of them were ashamed of the very thought that such a thing was possible, of the very idea that such a thing is possible in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the governor of a State has seen fit to go beyond all power recognized under the American Constitution or American institutions, he has not any authority to enforce such extreme proposals as he attempts to do.

Mr. LONDON. I know he has not; but the unfortunate part of it is that he occupies the position of an executive officer of the State; he has the police power and the militia of the State at his disposal. In other words, he has the physical force, supposed to be used by the State for the welfare of the State only; he has that physical power to back up his opinion.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the police force of the State is limited to the enforcement of the law, and the governor is governor only within the bounds of the law, and if he has issued an extra-jurisdictional decree he has no authority to put it into force, and if he attempts it the courts are there to protect the rights and privileges of the citizen.

Mr. LONDON. I entirely agree with the gentleman's construction of the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the governor issued this proclamation in pursuance of or in accordance with the authority of the legislature?

Mr. LONDON. No. The legislature has not acted in the matter. It is the individual act of the governor, the executive of the State.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the gentleman any information, waiving the statement in reference to the order, as to what was the occasion of the order?

Mr. LONDON. As far as the press would indicate, there was a movement among certain people in the State of Iowa—and I understand there is a movement among certain people in other States—to prohibit the use of any language other than English, out of a patriotic desire to see one language used in this time of crisis. But the mistake that these well-intentioned men make is that you can not appeal to people except in a language they do understand, that the only way of Americanizing one who is born in a foreign country is to teach him in his own language the value of American institutions. You can not reach him by a language that he does not understand. It is too elementary to require discussion. In other words, a man must in his own mother tongue learn to love and respect everything that is valuable in American institutions. You can not adopt, in the interest of uniformity of language, the foolish policy that has been destructive of public order in Austria-Hungary. There is a fundamental difference between assimilation in the United States and assimilation in other countries where it is the result of physical coercion. In Austria-Hungary the Hungarians have been trying for years to suppress the various Slav languages. In the German portion of Austria-Hungary they have been trying to suppress every language outside of German, with the result that they have aroused a profound sense of national pride in all of the smaller nationalities. There is nothing that will so stimulate the love of one's own distinctive language as persecution. Where you will accomplish things with love, you will produce the very opposite effect by coercion and oppression. There are well-meaning men who would like to see everyone speak the same language, but it can not be accomplished by mere edict. It must be the result of a process of education, of bringing up people to learn to love the institutions of the country. It can not be done by duress.

I hope that Congress will at an early opportunity express itself on the action of the governor.

Gentlemen, I thank you for your attention.

I give here the full text of the proclamation:

To the people of Iowa:

Whereas our country is engaged in war with foreign powers; and
Whereas controversy has arisen in parts of this State concerning the use of foreign languages:
Therefore, for the purpose of ending such controversy and to bring about peace, quiet, and harmony among our people, attention is directed to the following, and all are requested to govern themselves accordingly:
The official language of the United States and the State of Iowa is the English language. Freedom of speech is guaranteed by Federal and State Constitutions, but this is not a guaranty of the right to use a language other than the language of this country—the English language. Both Federal and State Constitutions also provide that "no laws shall be made respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Each person is guaranteed freedom to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience; but this guaranty does not protect him in the use of a foreign language when he can as well express his thought in English, nor entitle the person who can not speak or understand the English language to employ a foreign language, when to do so tends, in time of national peril, to create discord among neighbors and citizens, or to disturb the peace and quiet of the community.
Every person should appreciate and observe his duty to refrain from all acts or conversation which may excite suspicion or produce strife among the people, but in his relation to the public should so demean himself that every word and act will manifest his loyalty to his country and his solemn purpose to aid in achieving victory for our Army and Navy and the permanent peace of the world.
If there must be disagreement, let adjustment be made by those in official authority rather than by the participants in the disagreement. Voluntary or self-constituted committees or associations undertaking the settlement of such disputes, instead of promoting peace and harmony, are a menace to society and a fruitful cause of violence. The great aim and object of all should be unity of purpose and a solidarity of all the people under the flag of victory. This much we owe to ourselves, to posterity, to our country, and to the world.
Therefore, the following rules should obtain in Iowa during the war:
First. English should and must be the only medium of instruction in public, private, denominational, or other similar schools.
Second. Conversation in public places, on trains, and over the telephone should be in the English language.
Third. All public addresses should be in the English language.
Fourth. Let those who can not speak or understand the English language conduct their religious worship in their homes.

This course carried out in the spirit of patriotism, though inconvenient to some, will not interfere with their guaranteed constitutional rights and will result in peace and tranquillity at home and greatly strengthen the country in battle. The blessings of the United States are so great that any inconvenience or sacrifice should willingly be made for their perpetuity.

Therefore, by virtue of authority in me vested, I, W. L. Harding, governor of the State of Iowa, commend the spirit of tolerance and urge that henceforward the within outlined rules be adhered to by all, that petty differences be avoided and forgotten, and that, united as one people with one purpose and one language, we fight shoulder to shoulder for the good of mankind.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State of Iowa.

Done at Des Moines this 23d day of May, 1918.

By the governor:

W. L. HARDING.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the bill read now for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL SERVICE.

Constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels, to replace vessels worn out in service, in the third, fifth, and eighth lighthouse districts, or for use in the Lighthouse Service generally, $760,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, line 2, after the numerals "$760,000," insert the following new paragraph:

"SECOND LIGHTHOUSE DISTRICT.

"The sum of $15,000 appropriated in an act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, approved March 28, 1918, for the installation of an electrically operated block signal on the East Breakwater, Nantucket Harbor, Mass., is hereby made available for an electrically operated fog bell at said point."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to waive the privilege of amending the first paragraph, but by unanimous consent I would like to have the present amendment considered without waiving that privilege, in order to make some inquiries as to the first paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will prefer, I will withhold it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move, then, to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that I am correct in the assumption that this is the first time any committee of Congress has deputed to an executive officer the privilege of determining the number of vessels and the limit of cost of vessels within a stated total authorization, as is accomplished in the paragraph beginning on line 10 of page 1.

Heretofore, as I have understood the practice of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of other committees, they have placed a limit of cost on the amount that may be expended by the executive officer. But here this committee for the first time vests in the discretion of the executive officer the determination of the number of vessels that may be purchased without any limit of cost other than the total gross authorization. The phraseology, as the committee will notice, is "constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels."

If I am not mistaken, in the Book of Estimates the Department of Commerce specified the number of vessels that might be available for each respective district, namely, the third, the fifth, and the eighth districts, and the amount that could be utilized for each. I question the advisability of Congress leaving it to an executive head to determine the character of vessel, leaving it to his full discretion to have merely one vessel within the maximum amount of $750,000, if he so wishes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is the gentleman not conscious of the fact that the cost of vessels has gone up so much that the estimates made on each of these vessels would not perhaps get one of them?

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the fact, then the Congress should determine it and not leave it to the executive head to determine the construction of a vessel beyond all bounds which it is intended to provide for.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is not intended to change the construction of the vessels in any particular. We leave the construction plans exactly the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing here to show that you leave the construction plans the same. In the Book of Estimates there was a certain limit of appropriation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This limits it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the limit?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The limit is on the vessels—so much.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a provision made for three vessels?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet he is privileged to use all this amount for one vessel?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; it will not be done in that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman makes an assumption that is not based on the facts. The hearings show and the report shows that it is the purpose to leave with the executive officers the privilege of using all this money for one vessel if they see fit.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not if they see fit, but if they find it necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the difference between fitness, propriety, and necessity? I question whether that should be the policy of Congress, especially at this time. I would place some limit of cost on these vessels and not leave it to the executive officer to determine the maximum price of the vessel without any limit of cost. Under this practice what restriction is there upon the executive officer as to the furnishings of the vessel? It has been and is the purpose to place a limit of cost upon these vessels.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We are very anxious——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We are very anxious to get all the vessels we can, and the most useful, under the simplest and cheapest plan, but we have got to get vessels of some kind, and the estimates were made some time ago. If you made an estimate for boots some years ago, you would not get any boots now for the amount you estimated then.

Mr. STAFFORD. The excuse that the gentleman advances might be advanced for every character of construction that is authorized by the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be very much better and cost less to require the Secretary of Commerce to make a new estimate than to charge him with the responsibility of spending the money without limit?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is precisely correct from a business man's standpoint and the governmental standpoint. It is always the policy of the Government to place a limit of cost on these respective vessels. But here the committee places no limit of cost. If it is found that the limit of cost is not sufficient he can come to the respective committees and have the limit of cost increased, but I protest against this policy of granting freedom without limit at all to the executive officers to spend the entire amount for one vessel. I really believe it is open to severe criticism from a governmental standpoint.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the entire paragraph should be read.

Mr. MADDEN. This is an appropriation bill, is it not, and is being considered by paragraphs instead of by sections?

Mr. DOREMUS. It is not an appropriation bill. It is a bill authorizing appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it should be read by sections. If the gentleman will wait a moment, the Chair will have the entire section read.

Mr. DOREMUS. The Chair is absolutely correct.

The Clerk completed the reading of section 1.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUCKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on June 4, 1918, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses and for other purposes.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Of course if we need lightships or lighthouse tenders, me that the governor of the State of Iowa has issued an order that no language other than English shall be used in public; that no language other than English shall be used in communications on the telephone or in places of public worship.

In a most remarkable document, a parallel to which can not be found except in the Middle Ages, he says that while freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution and the State constitution, it is not a guaranty of the right to use a language other than the official language of the country. Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, line 2, after the numerals "$760,000," insert the following new paragraph:

"SECOND LIGHTHOUSE DISTRICT.

"The sum of $15,000 appropriated in an act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, approved March 28, 1918, for the installation of an electrically operated block signal on the East Breakwater, Nantucket Harbor, Mass., is hereby made available for an electrically operated fog bell at said point."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to waive the privilege of amending the first paragraph, but by unanimous consent I would like to have the present amendment considered without waiving that privilege, in order to make some inquiries as to the first paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will prefer, I will withhold it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move, then, to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that I am correct in the assumption that this is the first time any committee of Congress has deputed to an executive officer the privilege of determining the number of vessels and the limit of cost of vessels within a stated total authorization, as is accomplished in the paragraph beginning on line 10 of page 1.

Heretofore, as I have understood the practice of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of other committees, they have placed a limit of cost on the amount that may be expended by the executive officer. But here this committee for the first time vests in the discretion of the executive officer the determination of the number of vessels that may be purchased without any limit of cost other than the total gross authorization. The phraseology, as the committee will notice, is "constructing or purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and light vessels."

If I am not mistaken, in the Book of Estimates the Department of Commerce specified the number of vessels that might be available for each respective district, namely, the third, the fifth, and the eighth districts, and the amount that could be utilized for each. I question the advisability of Congress leaving it to an executive head to determine the character of vessel, leaving it to his full discretion to have merely one vessel within the maximum amount of $750,000, if he so wishes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is the gentleman not conscious of the fact that the cost of vessels has gone up so much that the estimates made on each of these vessels would not perhaps get one of them?

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the fact, then the Congress should determine it and not leave it to the executive head to detremine the construction of a vessel beyond all bounds which it is intended to provide for.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is not intended to change the construction of the vessels in any particular. We leave the construction plans exactly the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing here to show that you leave the construction plans the same. In the Book of Estimates there was a certain limit of appropriation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This limits it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the limit?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The limit is on the vessels—so much.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a provision made for three vessels?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet he is privileged to use all this amount for one vessel?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; it will not be done in that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman makes an assumption that is not based on the facts. The hearings show and the report shows that it is the purpose to leave with the executive officers the privilege of using all this money for one vessel if they see fit.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not if they see fit, but if they find it necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the difference between fitness, propriety, and necessity? I question whether that should be the policy of Congress, especially at this time. I would place some limit of cost on these vessels and not leave it to the executive officer to determine the maximum price of the vessel without any limit of cost. Under this practice what restriction is there upon the executive officer as to the furnishings of the vessel? It has been and is the purpose to place a limit of cost upon these vessels.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We are very anxious——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We are very anxious to get all the vessels we can, and the most useful, under the simplest and cheapest plan, but we have got to get vessels of some kind, and the estimates were made some time ago. If you made an estimate for boots some years ago, you would not get any boots now for the amount you estimated then.

Mr. STAFFORD. The excuse that the gentleman advances might be advanced for every character of construction that is authorized by the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be very much better and cost less to require the Secretary of Commerce to make a new estimate than to charge him with the responsibility of spending the money without limit?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is precisely correct from a business man's standpoint and the governmental standpoint. It is always the policy of the Government to place a limit of cost on these respective vessels. But here the committee places no limit of cost. If it is found that the limit of cost is not sufficient he can come to the respective committees and have the limit of cost increased, but I protest against this policy of granting freedom without limit at all to the executive officers to spend the entire amount for one vessel. I really believe it is open to severe criticism from a governmental standpoint.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the entire paragraph should be read.

Mr. MADDEN. This is an appropriation bill, is it not, and is being considered by paragraphs instead of by sections?

Mr. DOREMUS. It is not an appropriation bill. It is a bill authorizing appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it should be read by sections. If the gentleman will wait a moment, the Chair will have the entire section read.

Mr. DOREMUS. The Chair is absolutely correct.

The Clerk completed the reading of section 1.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUCKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on June 4, 1918, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 12280. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses and for other purposes.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Of course if we need lightships or lighthouse tenders, we should have them, and the proper provision should be made to secure them, but the language in the paragraph which authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to replace vessels that are worn out in the service in the third, fifth, and eighth lighthouse districts, or for the use of lighthouses generally, does not specify what the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to do specifically. It authorizes the appropriation of $760,000, and he can spend that $760,000 or any one ship or vessel.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is this an authorization or an appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. It is an authorization.

Mr. GARNER. Of course the appropriation probably would take care of that situation.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it would, because I think this authorization would make it mandatory upon the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate the entire amount for a single vessel if the Secretary of Commerce wanted that to be done.

Mr. WALSH. If he spent $760,000 for a single vessel he would not be replacing vessels worn out in the third, fifth, and eighth lighthouse districts.

Mr. MADDEN. No; he would not.

Mr. WALSH. He is supposed to build three vessels. If he builds only one he is not doing what is provided in the authorization.

Mr. STAFFORD. He could use one vessel for that purpose.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman, I presume, has read the report wherein the Secretary himself indicates how it is proposed to use this sum, and where the amount is divided in the report, $200,000 for one, $200,000 for another, and $160,000 for a third. The Secretary himself having made that report, is it fair to presume that he would try to spend it all on one vessel?

Mr. MADDEN. It is fair to presume that the responsibility of authorizing this work to be done is upon us, and I see no reason why we should evade the responsibility that we have by transferring it to the Secretary of Commerce or to anybody else. If the Secretary of Commerce says that he wants to expend $200,000 here, $200,000 there, and $160,000 somewhere else, and we agree that he should be permitted to do it, why not say so in the bill?

Why do we want to give him blanket authority to do something that we afterwards will know nothing about? There can be no question but that under the language of this paragraph he would have the power to expend $760,000 on a single vessel and transfer that vessel from one district to another if he thought proper, and thereby come within the spirit of the law if he did not comply with the letter of the law.

I am not saying that he will do that. I assume that he will exercise proper discretion in the expenditure of the money placed at his disposal, but why should we evade the responsibility that we have and leave him the latitude that this law, if enacted, will give to him? Why should not we say what the law is to be, what the expenditures are for, and where the vessels are to be used?

I am not criticizing the wisdom or integrity of the Secretary of Commerce. I am not criticizing his judgment, but I am unalterably opposed to the relinquishment of the responsibility we have imposed on us and the transfer of that responsibility to some one else. I want in every case where it is possible and proper for the Congress to specifically set forth what it intends the money it appropriates shall be expended for. Why should not we do that? Is there any reason why we should say that our knowledge is so meager that we must transfer the power to somebody else to do what he pleases regardless of the limits of cost? It is true that the Secretary of Commerce will be obliged to come to the Appropriations Committee and get the money under this authorization, but even then he need not furnish more than one vessel for the total amount of the money here authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the committee is not attempting to evade responsibility, it is endeavoring to comply with a responsibility. The evasion suggested by the gentleman from Illinois grows out of an inability to fulfill a responsibility and that inability grows in turn out of the industrial and economic conditions of the country resulting from this world conflict. I am almost tempted to tell an anecdote to illustrate this inability.

I once knew a mayor of a town who was perturbed that the fire bells on the preceding night did not give the sound of alarm of a disastrous fire. So he gravely moved the council of the town that the fire bells be tested every half hour preceding any fire that might thereafter occur. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. That would not be a bad scheme in this instance. I suggest that the committee ought to test their own wisdom by the introduction of the amount suggested by the Secretary of Commerce that will be required for each district.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois does not appreciate the moral of my anecdote. I know that the gentleman is very able about business questions as well as other questions; but to be sober——

Mr. MADDEN. This has no connection with the bottles found in the House Office Building?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; I am speaking of the "feast of reason and the flow of soul" and not of bottles. There is no way now to estimate in advance, even approximately, what each vessel will cost. It was manifest to the committee that the purpose of the Secretary is to build the number of ships covered by these districts. Whether he can do it or not we do not know. When the committee came to the question of apportioning a sum for each vessel it was confronted with impossibility, illustrated by my anecdote, and therefore the committee said it would not undertake to do an administrative act that under present conditions it could not meet. It therefore decided to perform the legislative function and leave the Secretary of Commerce to perform the executive or administrative duty.

He has no motive, no purpose, to escape his duty or to make the cost one bit larger than is actually necessary. The Government needs these vessels; it has to have them. I would suggest, with all deference to my friend from Illinois, that there is no trouble about the precedent; the Committee on Appropriations will take care of the division or apportionment of the total sum. The cost when the committee wrote the bill might not be the cost to-day, to-morrow, or the week after, it would be a mere question of approximation, and in my own judgment these administrative details under existing abnormal conditions Congress ought not to bother with.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman elaborate and explain how the Committee on Appropriations can take care of the matter as suggested by him?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the Appropriations Committee can say so much for one vessel and so much for another if it thinks it wise to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not within the power of the executive heads under this authorization to construct one lighthouse tender to cost $760,000 without any action or approval by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think so; I think the Committee on Appropriations must give the money.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I say that this is an authorization for an executive head to enter into a contract and the Committee on Appropriations will have to vote the necessary money to carry it out.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does it not take four or five years to get the committee to act after Congress has passed the authorization?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suspect the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] is entirely correct. As a practical matter, if but one vessel can be got for $750,000, would it not be better to get that one than to get none at all? I do not, of course, think that sum will be required; but if the abnormal conditions of the country are such that we can not secure a vessel for a smaller price, it may be wiser to get that one than none at all, for conditions may go from bad to worse and we must protect our water-borne commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered does not appropriate any money. The appropriation has heretofore been made and the department finds that they can not install the character of fog signal, namely, a whistle, for that sum of money. Rather than ask or an increase in the appropriation, I desire to make that sum available for the installation of a fog bell, and that is at the suggestion of the Lighthouse Department.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I would state that the amendment is satisfactory to the committee. I have talked with several of the members.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, would the committee have any objection to an amendment inserting a limit of cost upon the authorization which the department might utilize in the construction of these vessels?

Mr. DOREMUS. We have very serious objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought perhaps you might put the amount at $500,000, so as to give ample leeway to the department.

Mr. DOREMUS. If the gentleman will yield for a moment, the committee gave this matter very serious consideration. The committee feel that they have applied to this particular item the only business method that can be applied under the circumstances and get results. There is little to add to what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] has already said. The experience of the Coast Guard in the construction of vessels ought to be a guide to the committee in considering this provision. I think it was in 1914 or 1915 that an authorization of $350,000 was made for the construction of a vessel. Before the department could prepare the plans and get the bids the cost of materials and construction had so increased that the amount appropriated or authorized was entirely inadequate. They came back to Congress and got a second authorization, and before they could prepare plans and specifications the cost of materials and construction had so advanced that the second authorization was inadequate. They came back to Congress the third time, and the result is that to-day they are paying something over $600,000 for vessels that could originally have been purchased under the discretion provided here for $350,000. The committee did not reach this conclusion hastily. They gave mature deliberation to it, and, I repeat, we have endeavored to apply the only business method that can be applied and get the vessels in a time like this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I might agree with the logic of the position of the gentleman if I would accept as a premise that it was absolutely necessary, regardless of cost, to have these vessels; but having served on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I recognize that there are times, and these are such times, when the present vessels may be continued in the service without invading the welfare of the service, and then it might not be good business policy, with the increasing cost of manufacturing and production, to have them substituted with new vessels.

It is that policy which I criticize in this blanket form of authorization. If the committee were acquainted with the facts, I do not believe that the existing vessels, even though they are worn in some particulars, should be substituted, but they could be continued in service for another 5 or 10 years, and that the existing high prices, with demands for boilers, engines, hulls in our naval and merchant-marine service, do not justify us in paying 5 or 10 prices for a temporary expedient that could be postponed for 5 or 10 years. I consider it would be good business policy to postpone the effectiveness of this authorization.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman from Wisconsin has suggested that the committee did not know their business when they made this provision. To the effect that if they had known what they were about they would not have done what they have done.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made no charge against the illustrious committee and certainly not against the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW], who is an illustrious member of this illustrious committee.

Mr. WINSLOW. Even so, would the gentleman be kind enough to correct my impression as to what he did say? [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I would rather not burden the House to that extent.

Mr. WINSLOW. I shall come to the point I had in mind, and that is to ask the gentleman on what superior information he bases his statement in reference to the needs of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that there are many times——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that there are many times when the heads of departments come before committees, such as the Bureau of Navigation here, requesting authorization for new vessels in place of worn vessels, which could be continued in the service; but if conditions were ordinary, it would be better to have them substituted forthwith by new vessels, but under present conditions it would be far better to postpone the authorization of a lump sum for three vessels which could be utilized for one vessel until conditions become normal, so that the Congress would have some determination, and the committee should exercise that judgment in determining whether they want to have the full authorization which was intended for three vessels to be utilized for only one.

Here we grant, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan and corroborated by the position of the distinguished and honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that the conditions demand that we should allow the department to spend all of this money for one vessel, if necessary. I question whether the hearings, which I have read, justify that position, and I will yield to the distinguished and honorable gentleman from Massachusetts and the distinguished and honorable gentleman from Michigan to justify the position that it is necessary to use all of this money for one vessel.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the appropriation, "General expenses, Lighthouse Service," shall be available, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, for the payment of traveling and subsistence expenses of teachers while actually employed by States or private persons to instruct the children of keepers of lighthouses.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter to the secretary of the Board of Trade of the city of New Orleans, which I think is a complete answer to the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is no necessity for authorizing light vessels at this time, even though the cost is heavy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the letter read for information, because if it is inserted in the RECORD perhaps it will never be noticed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, March 1, 1918.

Mr. HERRING,
Secretary Board of Trade, New Orleans, La.

MY DEAR MR. HERRING: We are receiving complaints from various masters regarding the entrance to South Pass, there being no lightship there any more; nothing but a small buoy, with a tinkling bell on it, which in hazy weather can not be seen or heard at any distance.

We have recently had the steamer Willaston go ashore east of South Pass, and it is rather surprising, in the opinion of several masters, that more vessels have not been ashore at this entrance because of there being no lightship or any guide of any kind sufficiently far out to warn masters that the land is being approached.

The lighthouse is a considerable distance up the pass, and in hazy weather, when that becomes visible, the vessel is practically on top of the land already. Therefore, as a beacon, the lighthouse can not be considered of much use, except in clear weather.

Will you be kind enough to take this matter up in the proper channel and see if something could not be done to have the lightship replaced which, we understand, used to be stationed at the South Pass?

Yours, very truly,

ELDER DEMPSTER LINE AGENCY,
M. & R. WARRINER (INC.), Agents,
R. A. WARRINER, President.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter every lighthouse keeper and assistant lighthouse keeper in the Lighthouse Service of the United States shall be entitled to receive one ration per day, or, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Lighthouses, commutation therefor at the rate of 45 cents per ration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire whether section 2 has been read. I wish to make some inquiry about that as to whether this changes existing law.

Mr. DOREMUS. Section 3?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; section 2. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee——

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman from Wisconsin has already explained that, I believe, to the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was probably temporarily absent from the Chamber, so I will not impose upon the committee by asking further than to inquire that I assume this is new legislation. I remember in one of the prior bills there was some estimate of the department to provide the expense money for the transportation of children of lighthouse keepers. Was that ever adopted into law?

Mr. ESCH. No; this does not go to that. This merely provides for transportation and subsistence for the teachers to the pupils, the children of lighthouse keepers. There are certain isolated places where the children of lighthouse keepers have no school facilities, and it was thought that the Government would be justified in making this small expenditure, which would not amount to more than $4,000 in all, in order to relieve that condition. Some of the States, particularly Maine, already provide the teachers and the textbooks, and I think some other States have done something in that direction. This is to apply throughout the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will excuse me, will the gentleman please advise his colleague from Wisconsin as to what he previously said about the action of Great Britain in similar cases?

Mr. ESCH. They carry the whole cost of the education of children of lighthouse keepers. It is thought to be in the interest of the service and would help these lighthouse keepers who are far removed from centers of population and who suffer enough from isolation to secure for their families the benefits of an ordinary school education.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That hereafter all officers and employees engaged in the field service or on vessels of the Lighthouse Service, except persons continuously employed in district offices or shops, who shall have reached the age of 65 years, after having been 30 years in the active service of the Government, may at their option be retired from further performance of duty; and all such officers and employees who shall have reached the age of 70 years shall be compulsorily retired from further performance of duty: Provided, That the annual compensation of persons so retired shall be a sum equal to one-fortieth of the average annual pay received for the last five years of service for each year of active service in the Lighthouse Service or in a department or branch of the Government having a retirement system, not to exceed in any case thirty-fortieths of such average annual pay received: Provided further, That such retirement pay shall not include any amount on account of subsistence or other allowance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Perhaps this provision was explained at length under general debate, but I only desire to make one general inquiry, and that is as to whether this retirement feature is along the line adopted as to the Coast Guard Service?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Practically the same, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, but rather better, because it makes it dependent upon the average salary for the last five years. You can not promote a man simply for the purpose of retirement.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say in reference to his inquiry as to the Coast Guard that they have three provisions for retirement, or at least three classes. One is compulsory on reaching the age of 64, one optional with the department after 30 years' service, and the other is for physical disability, granted by a retiring board.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think this is not as liberal as the Coast Guard.

Mr. HICKS. It is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it safeguards the Government more in that particular by not providing for any retirement at all until the individual has reached the age of 65 years.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. A lighthouse keeper does not have to go out in boats as the Coast Guard does.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a recognition of the civil retirement principle which the Government employees have been so strenuously seeking for some years past.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This is the best provision I ever saw. It does not allow them to promote a man to a thousand-dollar salary from $700 in order to give him $750 retired pay, but it is based upon the average salary for the last five years.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will permit, he understands the Coast Guard provision is three-quarters of the annual base pay on retirement, and not a provision for graduation, as in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I well remember the effort which was made that succeeded ultimately in having the Coast Guard retirement provision passed. This, of course, is very much more conservative and safeguards the interests of the Treasury far better and so necessary in these times.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The gentleman from New York has pointed out there is this difference between the retirement feature of the Coast Guard, in that there is no retirement here for disability, and he has clearly shown that. I do not imagine that it is important to amend this section at the present time, but my hope is that if this becomes a law we will have an opportunity to see how it works, and possibly, if it is found advisable in the future, a disability retirement may be considered by the very able committee which has brought out this very humane provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the committee if they do not think this would be a good provision to put into this section as an amendment: "Provided, That this section shall not take effect until after the present war"? With this increase of pensions, this increase of expenses we are going to in this bill and in other bills, it seems to me we ought to look where we are going and have some regard for the purposes for which the money is being collected by bond sales and sales of war stamps and in all sorts of ways. Now, here is a service that has gone on all these years without a retirement pension law. This is engrafting on the public service a new character of pensions. This character of employees never were pensioned before. Why would it not be the proper thing, in the interest of economy, in the interest of spending the public money that is collected for the purposes of the war for strictly war purposes, that we defer the payment of this class of pensions until the war is over?

Mr. DOREMUS. If the gentleman is directing his question to me, I will say that in my opinion there never has been a time in American history that we can better afford to do justice than we can now. The gentleman correctly states that we have gone along for years and years without this. We are merely doing now what we should have done years ago. And as far as the question of expenses is concerned, there are only 133 men in the service to-day who would be affected by this provision, and the estimated cost is only a trifle over $100,000 a year.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment so as to ask a question. Would the gentleman state, if he knows, how many classes of public servants we have made beneficiaries of any retirement bill?

Mr. DOREMUS. There are those in the Army and Navy, as the gentleman from Ohio knows; the Public Health Service has a modified form of retirement, and the Coast Guard, which includes the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, and which were consolidated, as the gentleman will remember, in the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will my colleague from Michigan permit me?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The retirement provisions contained in the Coast Guard are distinctly of a military and naval character. The provisions are not civil; they are military or naval, and upon this aspect or consideration is the so-called pension and retirement features of the Coast Guard bottomed. It is not a civil pension at all.

Mr. FESS. Are we attempting to extend this sort of legislation to civil employees as well as to military and naval employees?

Mr. DOREMUS. I would hardly so construe it, I will say to my friend from Ohio. The reason which actuated the committee in incorporating section 6 into this bill was the peculiar character of the duties that these men are called upon to perform. We want to put them upon an equality with the men in the Life-Saving Service, and the gentleman will notice in section 6 an express reservation against men who are in offices in charge. And, as I stated some time ago, they were called upon during the year 1917 one hundred and sixty times to save life and property. Twelve of them were killed in the performance of their duty and approximately 200—I do not recall the exact figures—were injured. That is the basis on which we ask for this legislation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with this section, and with this tendency in legislation, and I wish it were so that we could in due time carry this same sort of legislation to cover our governmental employees, not only for the sake of the employees but especially for the sake of efficiency in the service of the Government.

Mr. DOREMUS. I want to say to my friend from Ohio that I heartily agree with him, and at the risk of making a prophecy I want to say that in my humble judgment the time will come when every department of the Government will be provided with some sort of a retirement system.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. DOREMUS. But I do not think this is any precedent for that.

Mr. BLACK. Would the gentleman from Ohio favor a civil retirement bill that would not be framed on the contributory plan?

Mr. FESS. No. I will say frankly that I would not favor any bill that does not take into consideration reasonable frugality on the part of those who were to be benefited and also the basis of contribution.

Mr. BLACK. The suggestion I have as to this particular provision is that these men are civilian employees, and we are starting a precedent here for providing a retirement law that is not framed upon the principle of contribution from the employee.

Mr. FESS. I have no doubt but that would be quoted when we come to considering the other character of legislation. However, this particular service appeals to me so much, those lonely people in the service of the lighthouses, that I would be very glad to support even this, though it is not on that basis. But, as I now see it, I would not support any retirement plan that is not based upon reasonable frugality and contribution.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Just a moment, if my Ohio friend will permit, in order that I may interrogate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. He made a statement, I think, a moment ago, that the men in the Lighthouse Service were to be regarded on a par with the Coast Guard. The gentleman, of course, knows that in the Coast Guard the physical requirements are very strict and severe, owing to the retirement for physical disability, whereas in the Lighthouse Service it is not so difficult for a man to enter that service where this feature does not pertain. Of course, in the branch of the service on board lightships the requirements are more stringent.

Mr. DOREMUS. I think the gentleman is correct. But I had reference to the retirement compensation that men were to receive.

Mr. HICKS. The physical requirements are different in the two services, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, with a view of making a brief observation in reference to this retirement system, and that is that in my opinion there is just as good reason for the Lighthouse Service being a part of the Coast Guard as there is for the Life-Saving Service. And having that in view, earlier in the session I introduced a measure to consolidate or merge the Lighthouse Service with the Coast Guard Service as an incident to creating an executive department of marine and fisheries. That measure, I believe, has been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I have been assured by the chairman of that committee that a hearing will be had upon that a little later, when the pressure of war matters is relieved.

Now, the Lighthouse Service, as everyone can see, is part of the coast service of the United States or the navigable-water service. The lighthouses and the light vessels are guarding the coasts and the navigable waters of the country, just as the Life-Saving Service is watching the shores and shoals to prevent wrecks and to rescue those in distress, and I think there is good ground for the contention that this great service, consisting of the lighthouses, the storm signals, beacons, buoys, fog warnings, light ships, and their tenders, ought to be constituted a part of the Coast Guard Service of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That would be especially true as to the entire coast line of the Pacific, from San Diego to Cape Nome, where many of the lighthouses are far distant from settlements, and where the lighthouse tenders actually perform the service of life savers, particularly when the Coast Guard stations and steamers are not within a great many miles.

Mr. WALSH. That is true, and, of course, it would be equally true in some of the inland rivers where they have lights, as well as the Lakes. While disasters of serious consequence may not occur there often, still those light keepers and employees act in the nature of life savers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They are always ready to do that.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. I trust, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this provision for retirement may be adopted and permitted to remain in this bill, and that while it may not necessarily be taken as a precedent for the form of a civil-service retirement law, possibly it may aid in the consideration and favorable action upon the proposition to make the Lighthouse Service a branch of the Coast Guard Service, which latter service in its consolidated form has come to be one of the most valuable and most efficient branches of the Government relating to navigation and the navigable waters of the Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That hereafter a superintendent of lighthouses shall be assigned in charge of each lighthouse district at an annual salary of not exceeding $3,000 each, except that the salary of the third lighthouse district shall remain at $3,600, as now fixed by law: Provided, That officers now designated as lighthouse inspectors shall be transferred to the positions of superintendent of lighthouses herein authorized in lieu of lighthouse inspectors: Provided further, That in the districts which include the Mississippi River and its tributaries the President may designate Army engineers to perform the duties of and act as superintendent of lighthouses without additional compensation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. McKEOWN. How many superintendents are in the third lighthouse district, where there is a difference of $600 in the compensation?

Mr. DOREMUS. There is only one superintendent of lighthouses in the United States who gets more than $2,400, and that is the superintendent at New York.

Mr. McKEOWN. That covers only this one man?

Mr. DOREMUS. That is all; and this bill affects, as I understand, 18 men in the United States.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DOREMUS. It leaves the salary of the superintendent at New York at what it already was.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 4673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4673. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to regulate the salaries of the respective keepers of lighthouses in such manner as he deems just and proper, but the whole sum allowed for such salaries shall not exceed an average of $700 per annum for each keeper; and the authority herein granted to regulate the salaries of keepers of lighthouses shall not be abridged or limited by the provisions of section 7 of the general deficiency appropriation act approved August 26, 1912, as amended by section 4 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 4, 1913." (U. S. Stats. L., vol. 37, p. 790.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this section by striking out, in line 23, page 5, the figures "$700" and inserting "$840."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 5, line 23, strike out "$700" and insert in lieu thereof "$840."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. SHALLENBERGER, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11284) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOREMUS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DOREMUS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 2298) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, report No. 153, be laid on the table. That is a former lighthouse bill, introduced by former Chairman Adamson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 6, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation to provide increase of pay of female operatives, printers' assistants, and skilled helpers employed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for inclusion in the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Resolutions of the Select and Common Councils of Philadelphia, requesting the Shipping Board be urged to provide adequate dry-dock facilities for shipping purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Memorial from residents and legal electors of the State of California, members of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Normandie Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, and one from other residents of Los Angeles, Cal., urging the enactment of legislation that will prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicants during the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a petition of Guy C. Stoddard and other citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., in favor of immediate enactment of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 6, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that at the front our boys are standing face to face with death, laughing in its face. They are not afraid, for there has arisen a new sense of God. They have carried with them the unconquerable spirit of their fathers and the beautiful and simple and never-dying faith of their mothers. They fight under our flag, which is a symbol of freedom. They are not afraid. We pray that we who stand back of them may be shaken out of ourselves into the same abandon of courage and faith and may support them with all the powers of a Nation consecrated to the freedom of the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SELECTIVE DRAFT.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, yesterday was the first anniversary of the draft. The registration and classification of 10,000,000 men constitute a supreme example of American efficiency, as well as a wonderful tribute to the genius of Gen. Crowder. I have here a statement by Gen. Crowder describing the operation of the draft during the first year. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL,
WASHINGTON.

The Provost Marshal General has sent to all the governors for publication to local and district boards the following telegram:

"One year ago occurred the first registration for military purposes of the young manhood of the Nation. Ten million men responded in a single day. This accomplishment was nothing short of marvelous. The task of utilizing this enormous force seemed unachievable. But the work of classification of this great mass of man power in such a way as to permit of its organization and molding into an effective army was intrusted to 4,663 local boards and 156 district boards, constituting a force of nearly 15,000 of the leading citizens of every community, who, assisted in their work by more than 100,000 equally patriotic volunteers, have performed a work that challenges the attention and excites the admiration of all our people.

"Well may we pause to-day, while another million of our youths enter the lists, and survey the results of the year's work. Each registrant has been examined and his availability for military service has been determined. In other words, these millions of men have been classified in such a manner that the Nation may now call for them to come forward into the Army. No call can be so large that it will not be filled immediately, whether the number be such as may be filled by those who have been found to stand in the first rank of availables or so great that men standing in the second, third, or fourth ranks of availability must go forward. In other words, all these millions of men who one year ago were an inert mass have become a mobile army. Each has found his place and each in his proper turn has marched or awaits the order to march.

"These results could not have been accomplished except through the devoted and unselfish labor of patriots. The local and district boards have scored an unprecedented triumph and have earned the undying gratitude of the Nation. Their achievement is one of the great successes of the war. They have already sent into camp, including those under orders for June mobilization, an army of more than a million and a half men.

They have already produced as soldiers one man out of every six registrants, and the world stands in profound astonishment as it views this accomplishment.

"Statistically stated, the local boards have sent and are sending their registrants to camp in the following numbers: September, general, 296,678; October, general, 163,644; November, general, 35,721; December, general, 20,320. Total furnished to January 1, 1918, 516,363. January, specialists, 2,024; general, 21,264. Total, 23,288. February, general, 78,672; specialists, 5,107. Total, 83,779. March, general, 121,915; specialists, 10,569. Total, 132,484. April, general, 166,343; school, 7,334; specialists, 700. Total, 174,377. May, general, 345,862; school, 10,175; specialists, 17,026. Total, 373,063. Total furnished to June 1, 1918, 1,303,354. June, general, 252,468; schools, 25,073; specialists, 14,813. Total, 292,354; or a grand total of 1,595,708.

"Compensated poorly, if at all, except by the gratitude and affection of their neighbors and of the Nation at large, the boards labored incessantly through the enervating heat of last summer, only to find a still greater task awaiting their unceasing devotion throughout the rigors of the following winter. Then, having accomplished the classification, they found themselves confronted with the mobilization of millions of men, and accurately and promptly they have performed and are performing this labor.

"Much work yet remains. To-day the new men of 21 are being registered and must be speedily classified. On the 1st of next month the local and district boards will be invested with the still further responsibility of preventing idleness and of unproductive employment which is not effective to the Nation in the emergency. Some boards will review their work and correct those inequalities which have been unavoidable in so tremendous an undertaking.

"The Nation, however, with full confidence in the men who have performed these great tasks in the past, faces the future without foreboding. The splendid work of our local and district boards and of the other great volunteer army of assistants has filled us with admiration. They have been tried and found true, and so long as this war may last our people are happy in the complete assurance that this great organization will not fail the Nation.

"CROWDER."

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 234).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $200,000 required for the enlargement of the Tuberculosis Hospital in the city of Washington, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Chief Clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the cause of the State of California v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 236), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the orders of the court dismissing the causes of the State of California v. The United States, congressional Nos. 12634-2-3-4-5, which causes were referred to the court by a resolution of the Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act (S. Doc. No. 235), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, on the 4th instant Senate Document No. 232 and Senate Document No. 233, being communications from the Secretary of the Treasury submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation for military purposes, were received and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. They should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be relieved from the further consideration of the provisions contained in these two documents and that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ASHBROOK, Mr. SLAYDEN, and Mr. ROBERTS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3547. An act to extend the provisions of the pension act to May 11, 1912, to the officers and enlisted men of all State militia and other State organizations that rendered service to the Union cause during the Civil War for a period of 90 days or more, and providing pensions for their widows, minor children, and dependent parents, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10297. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911; and

H. R. 11284. An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 1549. An act to require numbering and recording of undocumented vessels;

S. 4151. An act to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes; and

S. 2380. An act granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the congregation of the Mount Tabor Baptist Church, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of a Sunday rest law for the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Citizens' Association of South Washington, D. C., praying that an appropriation be made to establish a ferry line and landings at the foot of Seventh Street SW., to operate between there and East Potomac Park, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FRANCE. I present two resolutions, which I ask may be read and referred to the appropriate committees.

There being no objection, the following resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

THE AUTOMOBILE CLUB OF MARYLAND.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the meeting of the Automobile Club of Maryland, in session at Baltimore, Md., May 14, 1918:

"Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, assembled in its war convention in Atlantic City last September, urged as a war measure the prompt improvement of public highways; and

"Whereas the transportation requirements of the country, due to the war, can be only met by complete coordination of the carrying capacities of railroads, highways, and waterways; and

"Whereas there has developed in our country a tremendous increase in highway transportation for the haulage of munitions, foodstuffs, and essential supplies; and

"Whereas we recognize the necessity of a Federal wartime policy in respect to highway improvement, permitting the various States to immediately formulate a definite highway program: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Automobile Club of Maryland urges upon the officials of the Federal Government, the Senators and Representatives of the several States the importance of adopting a program that will insure adequate highway construction and maintenance as fully provided for in Senate bill No. 4032, introduced in the Senate of the United States March 8, 1918, so that our highways may properly carry their share of the burdens of transportation: Be it further

"Resolved, That copies of the above resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and Director General of Railroads, United States Senators, and Members of Congress."

This is to certify that the above resolution is a true copy.

[SEAL.] H. M. LUCIUS,
Secretary.

The following resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage:

NATIONAL WOMAN'S PARTY,
Washington, D. C., June 5, 1918.

Senator FRANCE,
The Capitol.

DEAR SENATOR FRANCE: We come to you as a friend of suffrage to ask that you take a message to the United States Senate from women munition workers of America.

The message that we wish to send is this:

Women war workers need the vote. They need it to protect themselves and maintain their efficiency, and they are convinced that it is their patriotic duty, with their efficiency as workers in mind, to make every effort to secure the passage of the suffrage amendment at once.

So long as the Government discriminates against women, employers will discriminate against them.

The Government says our work is as important as the work of soldiers. It admits that we face the risk of injury and death as soldiers face it, but it does not recognize us as citizens of the country as soldiers are.

In the munition plants we are put in men's places. The same production is required of us as of men, but in our rights we are not made equal with men.

Other nations in which the rights of the people weren't supposed to be protected as well as in this one have granted women the vote since they have been doing the war work of men. Rulers of other nations have received deputations of women munition workers and have visited them and recognized their importance.

The American people do not realize how many thousands of women are being put into the places of men called into the Army. Every man in the eight loading rooms of our factory will soon be taken in the draft and women put into these shops where accidents occur almost daily. Those of us who sign this letter are now fuse makers and inspectors handling the highest explosives.

We want to do this work for the Army; we do not mind the danger; we do not care how hard or dangerous the work becomes; but we are determined as American women, and as the rank and file of young American women have never been determined before, that we will be recognized as citizens of the Government we are working to defend and equals of the men who fight with the arms we make for them.

Respectfully, yours,

MARY COLUMBUS AKERS,
BERTHA WILLIAMS,
HAZEL LE BRUN,
ALICE DEMENT,
RUTH CRAIGHTON,
THERESE REHAK,
LOTTIE ROHR,
LOUISE BATMAN,

Workers in the Bartlett-Haywood Plant at Baltimore.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask permission to tender and have printed in the RECORD a number of petitions from my State of different societies of women respecting suffrage; also a petition for the passage of what is known as the Key bill, pensioning the Spanish-American War widows. The petitions are not at my hand and can not be for one or two minutes. I ask the privilege now when they arrive to tender them and to have them printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have here a communication from the Scandinavian Society of Park County, which is one of the growing counties of my State. The communication is very short, and I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the communication was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

CODY, WYO., May 16, 1918.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WARREN: We desire to make known to you that a society known as the Park County Scandinavian Society, of Park County, Wyo., has been organized with patriotic motives, and we ask that you give consideration to our purposes and that you extend to the President and Secretaries of War and Navy our assurance of absolute loyalty to the United States, and that you, as our respected representative, be advised that no matter what attitude in this war may be taken by our native countries we assure you of our loyalty to the United States, and we pledge to you our best efforts in maintaining unquestionable loyalty with the naturalized Scandinavians of the United States, and that you accept this information with many thanks for the many privileges and opportunities that have been presented to us since becoming citizens of this country.

G. A. HOLM,
Chairman.
R. O. LARSON,
Secretary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Federated Trades Council of Sacramento, Cal., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of the Equal Suffrage Club of Old Orchard, of the Equal Suffrage League of Brunswick, of the Equal Suffrage League of Dexter, of the Woman Suffrage Association of Portland, and of the Woman Suffrage Association of Old Town, all in the State of Maine, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of sundry druggists of Ottawa County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation for the organization of a pharmaceutical corps in the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Ward Seven Equal Suffrage Association, of Boston, Mass., praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legisiatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I entered the Chamber I heard a paper being read in reference to the so-called suffrage amendment to the Constitution. I have been deluged with letters and telegrams in reference to that matter. I have in my hand some letters and papers urgently asking me to do what I can to get action on that amendment. I have replied, as a rule, that the matter is in the hands of a commitee of the majority, and that whenever that committee is ready to move in the matter I shall be ready to cooperate.

I am now going to ask the chairman of the committee, if he is in the Chamber, whether or not there is any purpose of calling for action on the amendment in the near future. I do this for the reason that some of us at least may not be here many weeks during this torrid weather, and we feel, or I feel, that it is but due to ourselves, to the country, and to the advocates of the amendment—men and women—to take action upon it before long.

If the chairman of the committee is present I will very kindly ask him, or any Member representing the committee, what the purpose is in reference to an early vote on the amendment. Probably some other member of the committee will answer if the chairman is not present.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. That may bring the chairman of the committee here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martin	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smoot

Harding	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], is detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PITTMAN. I announce the absence of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] on account of death in his family. He will necessarily be absent for several days.

I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator pardon me? A query of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was made in the absence of certain Senators on this side, members of the Woman Suffrage Committee. It seems that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] is not present, and may I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will communicate his query to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who has intimate connection with the subject?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would not have made the observation I did had I been aware of the fact that my good friend, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], was absent from the Chamber. In fact, I thought I saw him in the Chamber. It will be remembered that I further observed that in the absence of that Senator I would be glad to have any other member of the committee give answer to the question that I propounded. I do not want to be troublesome in this body. I have been absent for five days unavoidably, and I find my table loaded with letters and telegrams and very important requests that I as a friend of the amendment should urge it to early action.

As I said a few minutes ago, I have answered it is in the hands of a committee of the majority, and I have no disposition to undertake to assume any authority that does not belong to me, that I want to exercise the usual courtesy as between the two sides of the Chamber and between the committees of this body, and that all I could do was to say that I was ready to vote upon the proposition at any time, and I hoped it would be considered in the early future.

Now, Mr. President, I would be happy if the Senator from Colorado, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, will make a statement concerning the matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the situation is simply this: There has been considerable agitation concerning this question, and a great many requests are coming in for an early vote. It has not been deemed advisable by the friends of the measure at the present time to press it for a vote. The truth of the situation is that we have not the promise of about two or three Members whose votes would be necessary to carry the amendment by a two-thirds majority. We hope and expect——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. You will not get them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think we will get them. I can not help but believe the logic of the cause is so clear and convincing that we will get them. I have no doubt that before the end of the session we will take a vote, and I feel confident that we will carry the amendment by a two-thirds majority; but with respect to the inquiry I will say that the friends of the measure are not pressing it at the present time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But after we get the other three, then will the measure be pressed?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think we will get them, and I think we will then pass the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I happen to be a member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage. While the reply of the Senator from Colorado is quite accurate, so far as it goes, I think he ought to be reminded and the Senate ought to know that at the last meeting of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, held, say, three weeks ago, it was definitely and officially decided by a vote that the committee would ask the Senate to take up the resolution for consideration and to vote upon it during the present session of Congress.

Personally, I believe it would be adopted if we submitted it at this moment; but I agree with the Senator from Colorado. As a friend of the resolution—a very warm and earnest one—I want it submitted at the time at which it can command the greatest possible number of votes; but, in any event, it ought to be submitted at the present session of Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I fully agree with the statement just made by the Senator from Iowa and heartily concur in the view that it would not be wise now to take a vote, although I have noticed in this body that whenever a movement has been advancing in strength and popular support the vote in favor of the passage of the measure is always a little larger than that which was absolutely promised. The growth in public sentiment in favor of equal suffrage has been enormous, especially since the beginning of the war. On that account I believe that we would likely pass the measure if the vote were taken now, but I feel also that to postpone it for a reasonable period of time would insure the passage of it at a later period of this session. I am confident the vote will be taken before Congress adjourns.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Colorado, before he takes his seat, if it is not a well-known fact in this Chamber that there is now a much larger support for this joint resolution than there has ever before been in any previous Congress?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that there is. The last time the vote was taken there was a majority of one, and now we are within two or three votes of the necessary two-thirds majority to pass the resolution providing for submitting the constitutional amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see a vote taken; those Senators who are opposed to the proposition assuming their position, as they are ready and willing to do, and we who are in favor of it recording our views. Then the matter can go where it belongs—to the country—and if it is interested sufficiently, there will be no question about the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I heartily concur in the statement the Senator has just made.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] seems to be thoroughly informed as to the present status of this measure, as one of the consistent friends of woman suffrage, ready at any time to vote for it, I should like to be let into the secret. I have not been informed, privately or otherwise, as to the status, further than such information as has been imparted by just such statements as we have listened to from the Senator from Colorado.

I say very frankly that I should very much prefer to deal with this as we deal with any other matter. I have not been accustomed to hiding legislation until we sought secretly to obtain what I consider to be a favorable vote upon such legislation, but rather to submit it upon its merits and let it be considered upon its merits.

Now, I am prepared to vote for the joint resolution; but, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to be delayed here, in the event other business of the Senate would allow me or justify me in leaving for a few days and then being called back peremptorily, as has been the case once heretofore, to suit the convenience of some gentleman who assumed to have charge of this measure. I am in favor of the joint resolution and shall vote for it; and if they will simply be kind enough to notify me about the time they propose to bring it up, I shall endeavor to be here.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement in regard to this matter. I am a member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage and I joined in reporting this proposed amendment. I have been for it; but the delay in bringing it to a vote, as I understood, has been at the instance of the women managers having charge of the amendment. Our committee had a meeting with the leader of the movement a short time ago, and the result of that meeting was that for the next 48 hours I was overwhelmed with some 200 letters and telegrams insinuating that we had been holding back the amendment, when, as a matter of fact, we had been holding it back at the instance of the women themselves.

Mr. President, all I have to say is that I shall vote for the proposed amendment, and the sooner we get it to a vote the better. I do not want to be subjected to this continual picketing. I want a little peace for the remainder of my days [laughter], and I therefore hope we may have a vote on this proposed amendment.

HOSTILE SUBMARINES ON AMERICAN COAST.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary may read an editorial from the Philadelphia Public Ledger of yesterday in relation to the visitation upon us of the German submarine boats. Inasmuch as I believe that the questions raised in the article are in the minds of many people in the country to-day, I hope, if not incompatible with the public interest, the Navy Department may issue such information as may be properly given out in relation to the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the article.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There was such confusion prevailing, as there usually is in this part of the Chamber, that I was unable to hear whether or not unanimous consent had been given for the reading of whatever it is the Secretary is reading, which appears to be an editorial from some paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, it is too late to make any objection, but I wish to give my usual notice that I shall object hereafter to the reading of such matter, and would have objected in this instance if I had understood what the request was, which I was unable to do because of the confusion around me here. I may have something to say later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the editorial.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order. The Senator from Arizona missed a great opportunity some time ago because of the confusion in the Chamber. We who desire to hear the editorial are all missing the opportunity now, and I ask that order in the Chamber be reestablished.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

The reading of the editorial was resumed and concluded, the entire editorial being as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, June 5, 1918.]

WHAT WARNINGS, WHAT DEFENSE?

Where was the powerful American submarine scout and destroyer fleet during the last 10 days of May and the first 3 days of June, while the U-boats were giving chase to American merchantmen, shelling, bombing, and torpedoing them? How could the skipper of the Bristol, when warned by the captain of the Cole that German undersea raiders were working along the coast, declare as late as Sunday last that to his knowledge the Government had flashed no wireless warning? Were the authorities at Washington incredulous of the stories of pursuits, captures, and sinkings constantly being brought in by captains and crews? And was our vigilant Navy at all cognizant of the presence of the super-submarines?

Eight days have elapsed since the Public Ledger printed the story of the three-master Edna, found off the mouth of Chesapeake Bay with a gaping hole blown below her water line, and two other large schooners in like conditions near by. Immediately afterwards stories were published about a German submarine sighted off the Delaware Capes, giving chase to a steamship that escaped her. A full fortnight ago the captain of the British tanker Cheyenne told of his escape from a U-boat attack 180 miles at sea, when he took refuge at the naval base at Lewes, on the Delaware shore. The Cheyenne's captain exclaimed at the incredulity of the naval authorities to whom he and his officers told the story. The Edna was attacked on May 25; its commander, later made prisoner on the U-boat which sunk his schooner, beheld the capture of the Winnicconne and the Isabel Wiley. There were the experiences, also, of the crew of the Hattie L. Dunn, sunk on May 25, and of the crews of two other schooners and a tanker that had been picked up adrift by an American steamship.

Wireless distress calls were sent out from the ships sunk by U-boats at least 10 days previous to the official Government warnings that closed the Atlantic ports. Why were not these warnings issued earlier? Where were the flotillas of destroyers and chasers, to the building of which the Nation has devoted hundreds of millions of dollars? If they were active, the commanders of American merchant shipping subject to attack seem not to have known about it. The U-boats got their prey. Passenger steamships and freighters appear to have put to sea without restraint and without knowledge given of the presence of the raiders. The failure to take quick and sharp naval measures is mysterious, puzzling, to the lay mind. Is there a proper explanation? Or is this one more case added to the piled-up enormities of bureaucratic stupidity during this war?

The disappearance of the Cyclops should have sufficed to get our coast patrol in action.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut tenders that editorial doubtless with the object of attracting the attention of the country to what he either feels has been a very great omission on the part of those who are managing the war or to give expression to the criticism of others who have such feelings. The editorial is significantly entitled "What defense," as I gather it, or "What explanation," as I understand. I do not rise to offer any detailed defense or seriatim reply to the editorial. Every public journal has a right to express its views, and it should be encouraged to do so; but, Mr. President, we ought not to let the public mind at this time be misguided nor allow false impressions to pervade the public confidence.

A certain number of vessels, whether cruisers or chasers, are now in the employ of the Government. The largest number have been used and are necessarily occupied in properly convoying or protecting the ships carrying our soldiers to the opposite shore. Those that are upon this side are limited in number. The new program of the Navy has been put into effect but a short while, not because of the fault of any administration, but because of the fault of the public that would never consent to expenditures commensurate with the needs of their country.

In view of this fact, sir, it must be apparent that the ships could not be everywhere at the same time, as intimated by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], in a voice that I overheard. They had to be at the places where they could best serve, as those guiding them thought, or at the places most needed that those controlling them thought necessary. To leave the impression, by the presentation of that editorial, that there has been some great offense of omission or some commission of fault somewhere, would be manifestly wrong, and would leave the country at large a basis for condemnation of the department without a hearing from the department and without knowing what are the facts.

Mr. President, I have a suggestion to tender to my eminent friend from Connecticut, whose abilities are admired on this side and whose genial personality is a source of pleasure to those who have his acquaintance. It is this: As a citizen of this country, if some one should ask me my personal opinion as to what was the reason of these submarines of Germany here upon the coast of the United States attacking the commerce and the ships of our land, I would say it has been brought about by certain Members of the United States Senate. I will tell the country, with perfect freedom to my conscience, that it was not until Germany was apprised by the inaccurate accusation, the unjustified impeachment from many sources in official place that this Government was honeycombed by fraud; that the administration was interlarded with crime and inefficiency; that there were no aircraft available to the Government; that the money which had been appropriated had been spent along questionable lines; that a form of corruption and pollution generally pervaded every department of the Nation; that we had neither Army nor Navy; that we had "fallen down," to use an expression which has been given common currency, in each of our war undertakings, and that in other administration of war preparation and national defense there had been such evidence of corruption and incompetence as to prove that we were unfit to defend ourselves and unprepared to meet an attack of our enemies.

These charges upon the administration were without foundation. These accusations were without merit. They led to a false conclusion in our own country. They induced Germany to conceive that in this land we were not prepared to defend; that we had neither aircraft above, ships below, nor army around——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to present a petition?

Mr. LEWIS. I shall be through in a second. I trust the Senator from Montana will defer for a moment one of his customary and amusing habits that he delights to exercise [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I think Germany was invited to our shores by the false charges which have been made against the administration by those who in different parts of this country sought to benefit politically by the aspersions made upon their own country. For myself I can see that Germany was licensed to believe that we had not any instrumentalities through which we could defend ourselves; that we were both weak and corrupt; and that this was what influenced her to send whatever forces of destruction she could command to our shores, to our confusion, and, if possible, to our undoing. That Germany will find us ready will not be gainsaid. That we are fully and completely prepared by no patriot will be disputed. But if editorials from conscientious editorial writers and men who are surrounded by limitations and more or less closeted to small quarters, apart from general information, are to be presented here upon the theory that the fears indulged by the editors shall go out to the country as established facts, and the query shall be, as the editorial is headed, as I heard it, "What answer? What defense?" For myself I am content in this observation to say, the first answer is that Germany was invited to our shores by the unjust assaults of those whose motives were to asperse our officials on the one hand or to profit politically on the other. The second reply is that there has been neither negligence nor omission; but if the continual tendency on the part of certain men in this country shall multiply, to ever hold up before their land that their country is unworthy, incompetent, and corrupt, we may have our fellow countrymen generally feeling that there is no defense for even undertaking a war, much less presuming to continue to carry it on.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator from Illinois have an idea that he can stop the German submarines here by making an assault upon the Republican Party this morning? Is that his method of meeting the submarines?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the eminent Senator from Minnesota to the fact that the words "Republican Party" have never escaped my lips, nor have I made reference to the word "Republican"; but if the accusation I have made against certain sources appeals to the eminent Senator from Minnesota as fitting the Republican Party from his knowledge of its conduct, I am unable, sir, to protect him from the impeachment of his own conscience. [Laughter.] But I can not charge the Republican Party with such. He would not be a patriot who could do such. He would not be a fair man who would undertake such. It would not be truthful. It would not be just. I specifically said "persons," and I continued using the expression, as the eminent Senator from Minnesota will know, "certain officials in public life" and "certain individuals here in this land."

A Senator on the floor has the right to take the words of people, if he believes them, of course, editors or private citizens, and when they ask to have their views presented in this body he is often powerless to decline it. When charges made in different quarters from private sources and private citizens are brought to a Senator he is compelled sometimes to give them official recognition; and it may be on this, the Democratic side, or it may be on that, the Republican side. But the fact will remain, and I insist upon charging, that there has been a spirit too general of late pervading the land and a license too universal by which we accept the accusation of anybody, anywhere, upon any official of the Government, and that, too, where the official is powerless to reply lest he betray the confidence of his Government. Such is the situation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War. Then, because of the necessary official silence, promptly must arise the conclusion to the public mind that he must be guilty.

For myself, sir, I respectfully say that I answer my eminent friend from Minnesota in all kindliness of heart that while I do not expect to stop submarines by anything I may say or anything that may be said here, I do not hesitate, again expressing my private opinion, in saying that Germany has been very much licensed and encouraged to assault us under the knowledge gathered from public officials of our own Government that we were unprepared to meet her, a statement without foundation in fact and a conclusion on the part of Germany which she will shortly learn is indulged to her destruction. This country is not only prepared to meet her, but, as shortly will be evidenced before the world, to meet her with vigor, power, and victory.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if anybody wants to cut me off by calling for the regular order, he has the opportunity.

Mr. LEWIS. Not on this side, I assure the Senator from Massachusetts, has there been such intention.

Mr. LODGE. I heard some one suggest it.

I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate long, and my purpose in rising is not to make an attack on any other American citizen of any party or to charge them with inviting Germany to come over here with her submarines. If I were disposed to do it, I might say that nothing has so stimulated and invited Germany as loose brags and boasts about the number of troops we are transporting to France.

Mr. President, Germany has not been invited here by any attacks made upon the American Navy, because if there have been any attacks made upon the Navy I, for one, have not heard them or seen them, and I have followed the subject with extreme closeness, for I am deeply interested in it, owing to my somewhat long service on the Committee on Naval Affairs.

What I wish to say is that the Navy and the Navy Department have taken every precaution that human foresight could suggest, so far as I am able to judge, and I have examined their preparations with such intelligence and care as I could give to the matter. I have no doubt that in the newspaper offices there are men who might have done it better, but unfortunately they are not charged with the duty. I am reminded of a little story that I heard the other day of Gen. Lee, who said to a friend that he thought the only mistake that Mr. Davis had made in the conduct of the affairs of the Confederacy was that he had not turned them over to newspaper editors.

Mr. President, the Navy and the Navy Department have necessarily anticipated a submarine attack from the very beginning of the war. They have had it constantly in their minds. They have tried to make every preparation to meet it. I think they have. It would be most injurious for me to stand here and follow down the map of the coast and tell the Senate and the public exactly what those preparations are—tell them where the submarine chasers are, where the destroyers are, where the signal stations are, what arrangements they have made for meeting the danger when it came, as they were sure it would come. No human mind possibly can tell when out of the great waste of waters of the Atlantic Ocean a submarine, which travels by night and submerges by day, will appear. As soon as the Navy had any authentic news to indicate the presence of submarines on this coast they acted. They will do everything that can be done. They have the means to do it. That is all that I feel at liberty to say in a general way.

Mr. President, for four years the greatest navy in the world has been devoting all its strength to the destruction of German submarines. They were operating in what are known as the narrow seas, where the commerce of the world, we may say, comes together in a closely restricted area; and even there, with the knowledge for years of the presence of the German submarines, it is not going too far to say that many of those submarines escaped them. They are diminishing now, with our assistance. A larger control is being established over the narrow seas, and the work against the submarines at the point of the greatest danger—what we may call the naval front in this war—is succeeding more than many of us dared to hope. It is done by the multiplication of vessels and the multiplication of methods, and there is the great center of the fight.

One or two submarines have appeared suddenly on our coast, as was to be anticipated. In my judgment, we are doing all that can be done. I have taken the pains to go to the department, where everything has been laid before the members of the Naval Affairs Committee who cared to investigate the subject, and I am entirely satisfied that they are doing everything that is possible. But the chase of the submarine is something like searching for the needle in the haystack. You can not tell in which particular wisp of hay it will come to the surface; but that the defense will be effective I have no sort of question.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I have had the general impression that submarines could not remain indefinitely at sea. It appears, from the information which we are able to obtain, that these submarines have been operating on our coast since prior to the 20th of May, now something like 15 days. They must have come presumably from Germany across the ocean to this coast, and they have remained here now approximately 15 days, and they have not yet disappeared. Can the Senator, without betraying confidence, give us any idea as to how long it is possible for a submarine to remain away from its base and to haunt the high seas and commit depredations

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, these submarines, of course, in the first instance came from Europe. They are believed to be, I think correctly, submarines of a very large type, built by Germany. It is understood, from the best information that can be obtained, that these vessels, some of them—they are very few as yet—have a steaming radius of over 6,000 miles. If that is correct, by hoarding their fuel and sparing it as much as possible, they would have some latitude in point of time; but of course there must come a moment when they must seek a base. It must either be a base on shore, where oil and other supplies are provided, or it must be a mother ship.

It seems not likely that they would have a mother ship with them, because it would be extremely difficult for such a ship to escape from German ports on the surface, and she would be almost certainly captured and destroyed. It is possible that they have received oil smuggled out of this country on some vessel. It could not be done, I should suppose, more than once. It is highly improbable that they have any base on the coast of the United States or of Canada, because the land patrol and the sea patrol are almost as absolutely complete as they can be made. We have a patrol along the coast, which is composed chiefly of what is known as the Life-Saving Service, or the Coast Guard, as it is now known. We also have an organized system for procuring information from fishermen and others on the coast, extending from Maine to the Gulf. Those sources of information were organized and in operation through the Navy Department at least two years before we entered the war; so I believe that so far as our own coasts are concerned the chances of a base there are almost negligible. The chances of a base in the West Indies, I think, are very small. I do not like to go into all the details, but I think it will suggest itself to Senators if they will consider the different islands, beginning with the lower end of the Lesser Antilles, possessions of France and England, and coming up to the islands which we either control or are interested in, ending with Cuba, where we have a great naval base at Guantanamo.

There remains, of course, the possibility of a base in the Gulf of Mexico, on Mexican territory.

I should like to tell the Senate why I do not think a base can be freely used there even if one exists, but I can not. I do not think I ought to tell it or ought to tell the arrangements that have been made. It will suffice for me to say I think it would be extremely difficult, even assuming a base, to get away from there at all or more than once. There are all those possibilities of their getting supplies or getting oil.

Mr. President, I did not rise to go into the details to describe to you the different naval districts of the country and what has been done in each one of them, but simply to tell you what my own opinion is after having examined all the arrangements with the utmost care of which I was capable and with the most intense interest and give my word for what it is worth, that in my judgment the Navy and the Navy Department, the Secretary and Assistant Secretaries, and all the officers, the Chief of Staff, and every head of bureaus has done everything that human foresight could suggest.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. JONES of New Mexico addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. In one moment. I want to finish what I have to say. I want the Senate also to remember that when newspaper editorials ask what the Navy is doing I should like to have them consider why it is that we have sent all the troops we have sent—and we have sent a great many thousand—why it is that they have gone to Europe without the loss of a transport, thank God, as I do. How is it that that has happened? It has happened because of the American Navy, which furnishes the convoys, and no other cause.

I wish I could go on and tell you what the American Navy has been doing in the narrow seas. I can not. The Navy has remained largely silent about its work and its preparation, and it is one of the best things about it, but it has been doing the greatest possible work everywhere. It has not failed in convoying the troops. It has not failed in its work in the Baltic and the Channel and the coast of France and the Mediterranean, and it will not fail here. It will do everything that courage and intelligence and bravery can possibly do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. It is in relation to the length of time these submarines can remain at sea. The Senator gave some information in regard to it. This question has occurred to me: Is there any supply that the submarine must necessarily have to remain at sea that it could not obtain by the capture of vessels?

Mr. LODGE. Everything except oil.

Mr. NORRIS. Gasoline?

Mr. LODGE. Fuel oil. I suppose they use fuel oil and not the refined oil.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume if they captured a ship that was either transporting that kind of oil or using it, they would be able to supply themselves from that source, and therefore might stay out a good deal longer than they otherwise could.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly, if they should capture a ship with fuel oil they could take a supply from it. The only tanker they seem to have successfully attacked in this raid was beached, and it is being salvaged by the Navy. I do not think they got any oil.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico rose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further petitions and memorials, reports of committees are in order.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM THE NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) further extending the time within which the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River shall remain in effect, and I submit a report (No. 480) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 9, to strike out the word "January," after the word "approved," and insert in lieu thereof the word "June," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That public resolution No. 45 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, approved January 19, 1917, entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River," which was further extended by public resolution No. 8 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, approved June 30, 1917, is hereby again continued in full force and effect and under the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations, until July 1, 1919, unless the Congress shall before that date enact legislation regulating and controlling the diversions of water from the Niagara River or from boundary streams generally, in which event this resolution shall cease to be of any further force or effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before suggesting an amendment, I wish to apologize to the Senator from Nebraska. I had not realized that the resolution would be reported so promptly, although I do not object to its prompt report, because it is of an exceeding importance, but may I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the resolution which was passed last year extending the period for the diversion of an additional amount of water from the Niagara River from above the Falls contained a proviso which prohibited any of the companies from installing any additional power-generating machinery, and also contained a proviso which prohibited the industrial companies which purchased or contracted horsepower from the power companies from themselves installing any additional power-consuming machinery. As the result of those provisos while under treaty of the diversion of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second daily average is permitted on the American side, it was the purpose of that permit, which it is now sought to be extended to permit the diversion of the full 20,000 cubic feet per second. The prohibition against the installation of any additional machinery as contrasted with the machinery which was in operation at the time the original permit was given has prevented the industry along the Niagara frontier upon which the War and Navy Departments are dependent for most valuable material from taking advantage of the other provisions of the permit, and instead of diverting 20,000 cubic feet of water per second they have only been able to divert 18,000 cubic feet of water per second.

I was going to confer with the Senator from Nebraska and would have done so had I realized that the resolution was to come up so promptly. I was going to ask him if he would not consider favorably an amendment to the joint resolution which would eliminate from the permit as granted under the prior resolution that prohibition against the erection of additional machinery. I have an amendment prepared.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should be glad to hear the Senator's amendment, though I doubt whether, under the authority of the committee and the request of the Secretary of War, I would be justified in accepting any modification of the original resolution.

Mr WADSWORTH. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator, before it is read, if, with the language stricken from the resolution to which he has called attention, we would still be within the maximum provided by the previous act—20,000 cubic feet?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly. The provision in the previous act has miscarried, that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The limitation, then, has operated to limit development rather than the use of water?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely. That is all it does. I ask the Secretary to read the proviso that I wish to add to the resolution.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That the limitations contained in said first-named resolution, restricting such additional diversions permitted to the capacity of the generating machinery of the permittee and tenant companies, installed and ready for operation, and to an amount sufficient to supply existing hydroelectric demands of customers which such permittee and tenant companies are supplying, not exceeding the capacity of their power-using appliances, installed and ready for operation, shall not be applicable during the extended period covered by this resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I doubt very much whether it would be wise to amend the joint resolution at this time in this hasty way and modify the original grant of authority to the Secretary of War. The letter which I have here, which I will insert in the RECORD, asks for no such authority. He simply desires to continue the present condition of things.

I may say to the Senator from New York that at the request of the Secretary of War there has been prepared and introduced in both Houses of Congress a bill providing for the general control of boundary waters in a permanent way, and it is only because that bill can not be considered and reported in time to meet the present emergency that this resolution of extension is now offered. We are now operating under a resolution which expires on the 30th of June, and the one which I have offered extends it beyond June 30 for one year, or until Congress permanently legislates on the question. I think when Congress comes to legislate permanently on the question will be the proper time for the Senator from New York to propose the modification of the resolution. I am a little afraid by changing the resolution at this time there might be an inducement to companies to install machinery which might be the basis for claims on their part that they had acquired certain rights under the permission of Congress. I wish the Senator would permit the joint resolution to go through as it has been considered by the committee and recommended by the Secretary of War. That will be the best for all concerned, and the other question can be taken up with permanent legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course I recognize some of the elements in what might be called the tactical situation. We have a bill pending, one introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and one in the House by the gentleman from Virginia. Personally I have no faith that that bill can pass as it is now drawn at this session of Congress. That is my personal judgment. I may be utterly mistaken. The thing that has disturbed me for more than a year—for two years, in fact—in this connection is that the factor in the situation that suffers most by reason of this restriction in the development of power is the Government of the United States. The power companies do not suffer. They can sell all the power they can generate. When the previous resolution was passed a year ago and that proviso was put in, while it permitted the companies to divert 4,000 additional cubic feet of water per second at the same time there was put in another proviso, which prevented them from using it all. It did but very little good, and to my mind it is of exceeding importance from the standpoint of our efforts in this war, for it is at Niagara Falls that are produced some of the most important chemical materials that are used in the ordnance program. It is of exceeding importance that Congress shall permit the full use of the 20,000 cubic feet at the earliest possible moment, and the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska does not do it. That is the only thing I have in mind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator that the bill introduced by me in the Senate, and which was also introduced in the House, probably undertakes to do too much, and I may say to the Senator that the Committee on Foreign Relations, which has given some consideration to it and referred it to a subcommittee, is disposed to simplify it greatly, so as to remove objections which have been raised and confine its operation to the waters of the Niagara River. In that form I believe it can be passed at the present session of Congress. So this extension will probably only operate for a short time until that permanent legislation comes before Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the Senator realizes that there are some other elements in his own bill which will give rise to the most serious contention in the Senate and elsewhere, in addition to the mere fact that it is general in its application instead of applicable only to the Niagara River. Will not the Senator be willing to accept this amendment and let it go to the other House, and if it is to be stricken out let it be stricken out there, inasmuch as it was there inserted originally. There seemed to be a dire dread that somebody was going to steal something at Niagara Falls. That was the reason why it was put in, lest somebody should establish a vested interest which could not be revoked at some later time. As a matter of fact, there is no such possibility.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether there has been any State legislation upon the question of water power connected with Niagara Falls?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There has; a great deal.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And has that legislation tended to control the water power there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the Legislature of the State of New York can have no control over the diversion of water from a navigable stream. That rests only with the Congress, but as to the generation and distribution of the power the State of New York, through its commissions, absolutely controls the rates and charges and the method of distribution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, the State, as a matter of fact——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator the State of New York protests most vigorously against any action of Congress that will invade her sovereignty and deprive her of the right to regulate those charges and assess those taxes and control those properties.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Unquestionably the State of New York has that sovereign right, and it does seem to me that the United States Government ought to concur in anything the State of New York may desire with relation to the water power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that it would be quite possible for the Senate to accept the amendment and allow it to go to conference. When the issue was up before, the other House took strong grounds in favor of having this limitation, and on account of the importance of bridging over the present emergency until the matter can be fought out in permanent legislation, I think it would be a mistake to attempt to change it at this time. I hope the Senator will not press his amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I dislike very much to disagree with the Senator from Nebraska because we are of the same mind on these matters, generally; I would not insist on the amendment if I did not know as a matter of personal knowledge that the Government of the United States is not getting the service which this resolution pretends to give it. They are not diverting the water which the resolution authorizes them to divert, because they are not permitted to install any additional machinery. You can not generate power by diverting water unless you gather the water into a pentstock and drop it down on a turbine wheel. Until they can put an additional unit in the passageway through which the water flows, the Government of the United States does not get any increase worthy of the name in those materials upon which it relies for the building of cannon and the manufacture of armor plate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know whether I fully comprehend the Senator's position. Is it that there is not machinery enough now installed to use the sixteen thousand and some hundred cubic feet which this resolution permits?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is machinery enough installed at present to use the amount of water which was being diverted prior to the permit which authorized an additional 4,000 cubic feet per second. There is machinery, in other words, installed now, and has been for many years, capable of using the 16,000 cubic feet; but if you divert the other 4,000 feet which this resolution proposes to give——

Mr. SHIELDS. Then the amendment proposes to allow the use of the full 20,000 cubic feet per second.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. With new machinery to be installed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter from the Secretary of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 30, 1918.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: You are so familiar with the power situation at Niagara Falls that I need only to ask your attention to the latest phase of it, which is that the companies now using the 4,400 second-feet of water under authority of the joint resolution approved January 19, 1917, and extended by joint resolution of June 30, 1917, are by force of these two resolutions prohibited from using the water after June 30 of the present year. In the meantime, both your committee and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs are considering a new plan of development requiring great expenditures and leading, it is hoped, to a more economical and intensive development of the power situation at Niagara Falls. The joint resolution of January 9, 1917, makes it a misdemeanor for these companies to continue using this surplus water after June 30, 1918, and I am afraid I have no power to extend that permit; indeed, I am under a definite promise to your committee and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs not to make an extension of the permit. But the war situation is such that any suspension by these companies of the use of this power at this time would seriously interfere with the production of needed or, indeed, indispensable war supplies. The steel production of the country depends, in an important degree as to some grades of steel, upon the continued and maximum production of steel alloys and ingredients at Niagara Falls. As Congress is considering a recess from the 15th of June to the 1st of August, a very serious situation confronts us, and I am writing to inquire whether a joint resolution could not be passed by the two Houses as a matter of the greatest urgency which would extend the permit from day to day at the discretion of the Secretary of War, so as to carry this situation over until the Congress can determine its course of action upon the larger legislation now under consideration. If such joint resolution should for any reason be impossible of passage, I would like to have your advice as to what action I ought to take to prevent this inadmissible interruption in the production of war materials.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have had that letter read to show that the Secretary of War evidently has reason to believe that this surplus power is now being used. It may be that it is not being used to its full capacity, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] seems to suggest; but this is all that the resolution of the Senator from New York asked for last year. It is very evident that from the Government standpoint there is no need for any additional mechanical facilities or diversion of the water at this time or the Secretary of War would have asked for it. I therefore hope the Senator from New York will not insist on the amendment, which I think will only produce delay, and which may provoke a good deal of difference. It is a very simple proposition, to continue the power which already exists and the extra diversion which this joint resolution permits; and I think the Senator should be satisfied with that at the present time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will permit me, what particular difficulty does the Senator from Nebraska anticipate from the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York? Does he believe that the power companies will get more rights than we intended in the former resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I fear there might result complications, and it is very evident that the other body of this Congress has such a feeling, because it insisted two years ago upon the insertion of this limitation in the resolution of extension. It is a difficult question, at best.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I recall that this matter has been here many times and that the suggestion made by the Senator from New York to-day has been heretofore made. It has been my understanding that under the operation of the grant of two years ago the actual beneficial use of the water which we intended should be granted has been denied in part, and that a part of it now is being practically wasted, which ought to be employed in beneficial production at this time.

I have listened to the Senator and I have been trying to find out what the particular objection was and the ground for it, but I have not been able to understand it, and I never have understood it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe I can set forth in a moment the condition. Originally the Burton Act was passed, which limited to 15,600 cubic feet per second the amount of water that might be diverted on the American side of the Niagara River. That act expired by limitation on June 29, 1909. There was an extension resolution for two years. About the time the extension resolution expired we entered into a treaty with Great Britain, by the terms of which the Dominion of Canada or the Province of Ontario were permitted to divert 36,000 cubic feet per second of water from the Niagara River above the Falls and the United States was authorized to divert 20,000 cubic feet of water from above the Falls. Under the law which we previously had companies had only been permitted to take 15,600 cubic feet, so that there remains a possibility, under the terms of the treaty, of our diverting 4,400 additional cubic feet of water. Under the resolution which was adopted by Congress in 1917 the Secretary of War was authorized to permit existing companies with existing facilities to take that 4,400 cubic feet of additional water power.

This letter from the Secretary of War states in plain English that they have done that thing and that they are engaged in manufacture which is important to the war industries of the United States, and until now I have never heard a question raised that the full 4,400 cubic feet per second is not being used. There may be a little shortage, but I do not think it is wise in a hasty resolution, without opportunity to consider the merits of the question, to say to those additional companies, "You may install additional machinery; you may have the last foot of that water." We might in such a way give them vested interests which the public rights and public interests at least do not now require. I think we had better confine ourselves in this emergency to doing the simple thing, merely continuing what has been satisfactory for the past two years, and which was all that the Senator from New York asked a year ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska has stated the history of this legislation with absolute correctness. I understand it in just that way. But the question has been raised prior to this day. We granted 4,400 additional cubic feet of water to these companies. Now we describe the way that they must use it; it is with existing machinery. The real reason, as I understood, was to give them the use of 4,400 feet for manufacturing purposes. It was thought at the time that existing machinery was sufficient to utilize it, but it has been discovered that it is not sufficient; that they can install more machinery and use exactly the same amount of water that we have granted to them. It seems to me that it is in the interest of economy and in the interest of efficiency at this time that that much water should be used. That is the only point that I have in view.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, all I have to add to the discussion is this: The shortage of power at Niagara Falls is most acute. As a matter of fact, the Federal Government, acting through the War Department, stepped in there shortly after we entered the war and commandeered all of the power generated by the companies on the American side. That power is now distributed and delivered only to those industrial concerns that are manufacturing goods for the Army or the Navy. There is not enough. I know myself of three great paper mills that can no longer get any power at all from that source, which for years had been dependent upon power delivered to them by the power companies. I only cite that to show the seriousness of the situation.

Now, it is a fact which I can vouch for that the present situation is such that they can not use more than 18,000 cubic feet of water per second on a daily average. They are entitled to use 20,000 cubic feet, and if they were permitted to put in a little additional machinery they could use it.

Mr. President, 2,000 cubic feet of water per second means 20,000 horsepower. It is a serious matter. That 20,000 horsepower is worth hundreds of thousands of dollars in the course of a year and will save just that much fuel and deliver just that much more of the material that the Government wants.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question. The matter which the Senator is now urging was before those who are interested in this matter when the existing extension was granted, was it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was.

Mr. HOLLIS. And it was considered. Now, the Senator states a very plain case, one to which there must be a good answer or else his idea would prevail. I know the Senator will be straightforward enough to give the answer that those opposed to his amendment make. Would he do that for the Senate? I do not know what it is, but I know there must be something to be said on the other side.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator asks me to present the argument of those who oppose me.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; because no one else seems to be able to do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My understanding is that when the permit resolution of a year ago, or thereabouts, reached the House of Representatives some suspicion arose in the minds of Members there that if this 4,000 additional cubic feet was authorized and the companies in order to use it put in a little additional machinery, at some time later on the companies might be able to say that by having put in that additional machinery they had acquired morally or legally some vested right to the continual and perpetual diversion of the water. It is a consideration that did not appeal to me at all, I will say very frankly. It was for that purpose, if I remember correctly, that this prohibition was inserted in the resolution forbidding them to put in the machinery which would enable them to use the water.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from New York will yield to me, I think he is familiar with the fact—I know I am—that each new demand to get power at Niagara Falls has been buttressed with that very argument. When we reached the point in our conservation at Niagara Falls when the country became very greatly interested we crept up to 15,000 cubic feet a second, and then to 16,000 cubic feet, and finally to 20,000 cubic feet. The Falls have not been seriously interfered with, and, as the department suggests, they are at liberty to revoke any permit which they give at any time when they discover that an undue amount of water is being diverted for power purposes. But I must say that the suggestion of the Senator that the maximum amount of water should be used at this time appeals very strongly to me; and while I do not know that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations would feel at liberty to accept an amendment of the character proposed, yet, for one, I should dislike very much to see the opportunities for power at Niagara Falls unnecessarily curtailed at the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, this bill now being before the Senate by unanimous consent, if the Senator from New York insists on his amendment, we might as well come to a vote on it. I think it very unwise to adopt the amendment. We are doing exactly what the Senator asked for last year, and we are doing exactly what is asked for by the Secretary of War for public purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that the letter from the Secretary of War contains an assumption which is not accurate. He assumes that the additional 4,400 cubic feet of water is being used. It is not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And, so far as I know, this is the first time that in any public place it has been stated that it is not being fully used. There may be some private interests who want this additional horsepower, but, so far as the public interests are concerned, there is no evidence anywhere that this additional horsepower is necessary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish the Senator would not throw that suspicion against this amendment. The Government uses all of this power; it takes everything that is manufactured by the power derived; and it is not getting anywhere near enough.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from New York what Government agency states that? I have a communication from the Secretary of War in which he says that the surplus horsepower is being used under existing legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is mistaken; it is not being used. I am sorry to disagree with the Secretary of War, but I doubt if he has informed himself upon that phase of the matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is the Secretary of War who has given the license for the use of this horsepower; and the license has been in existence now not simply for one year but for two years. I think it would be a great mistake for us to brush aside the only authoritative statement that we have from official sources and grant these companies the right to put in additional machinery when that grant might possibly ripen into a valuable property for them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Nebraska realize that the Secretary of War has asked these companies to install additional machinery, and that they now are making contracts for the delivery of additional generators? The War Department wants more machinery. I doubt if the Secretary of War realizes this situation, if it can be said that he is against any additional machinery being installed, because I happen to know that, due to the terms of a bill which passed the New York Legislature one month ago consolidating the two companies on the American side, which was passed at the earnest request of the Secretary of War, the consolidated company is to-day, at the request of the War Department, making contracts for the purchase of additional machinery in order to get more power.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator raises an entirely different issue. It is true the Secretary of War, representing the administration, wants a change upon the Niagara River; he wants a consolidation of the companies; he wants the installation of improved machinery, because one of these companies is operating with machinery which only secures a portion of the full horsepower which might be secured.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The machinery is obsolete.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He wants that as a permanent thing, but he does not want to secure that by means of a temporary resolution; he wants to secure that by legislation duly considered by Congress; and it is for that permanent legislation and for those permanent arrangements that this additional machinery and that consolidation authorized by the New York Legislature is proposed. I think the Senator is making a great mistake in bringing into this temporary resolution a provision which might ripen into the establishment of corporate rights in the additional horsepower.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I think both Senators are wrong about the history of this resolution. I was on the subcommittee on both occasions, I believe, and on the conference committee when both resolutions were passed—the first one and the second one reviving and extending it. The limitation now complained of by the Senator from New York, and sought to be obviated by the amendment proposed by him, originated in the House, or, I believe, in conference. The House passed a joint resolution which legislated specifically upon this subject, as I remember it; but finally, by agreement, in order to get a joint resolution passed, the one now proposed to be revised was agreed on and reported to both Houses and passed. There was a desire then to use this power that is going to waste, and upon the utilization of which the war emergency makes a greater demand than ever; but at that time it was hoped that permanent legislation would be passed very soon, and the whole matter settled.

My understanding is that this power is not being used, and that there is now, I believe, 3,400 or 3,600 cubic feet per second that is going to waste.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, Mr. President; I am sure there has not been before the Committee on Foreign Relations or before any subcommittee thereof, or, so far as I know, before any Senator, any official statement that a single foot of power is being lost.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the Senator is mistaken. We have had hearings on this matter, I believe, lasting about two weeks. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] wanted this joint resolution passed. The Senator from Delaware was the chairman of the committee. The late Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Husting] introduced a great deal of testimony on the subject; and there is no question, as I understand, that all of this power in excess of the permits, between the amount of the permits and the 20,000 cubic feet per second, is now going to waste and is not being used.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care to take part in this debate; but if we are going to dispose of it this morning, and it is not going over, I am very anxious that we have a few minutes to dispose of another matter; and if it is going to be debated at length, of course I think it ought to go over anyway.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think possibly I can clear up a misapprehension that exists, by reason of the debate which has been going on, as to the amount of power used. Of course, one's recollection is a trifle indistinct, but I will ask the Senator from New York if my recollection is not correct in making this statement:

When this joint resolution was originally reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, it was with a view to enable the companies operating at Niagara to use all the water power that they could use with the machinery then installed, and was intended not to encourage them to install other machinery until more permanent legislation could be enacted which would be in accord with the general views of both Houses of Congress. My understanding of the situation is that we authorized those companies to use every cubic foot of water flowing over Niagara Falls that their then installed machinery could utilize, but we did not intend to encourage them to install other machinery by which they might make some vague or shadowy claim to special consideration if it was contrary to the principles of the legislation which Congress proposed to enact.

I want to say to the Senator from New York that I am absolutely in accord with him in the desire to utilize every ounce of power that it is possible to obtain from Niagara Falls or any other water power in this country, and I believe it is very necessary. I do think, however, as the discussion this morning has shown, that we had better continue the joint resolution in the terms in which it now is, rather than attempt to enlarge it, and thereby cause delay in this matter.

I should be perfectly willing to utilize the whole of Niagara in making useful things for the prosecution of this war, and I think probably the people of this country would favor that. We can return to scenic beauties after the war is over, but we want to preserve those scenic beauties by winning this war ahead of anything else. I am in accord with the idea of the Senator from New York; but I think that the idea of Congress, and certainly the idea that existed about two years ago, when I reported this joint resolution, was that there should be no special or additional grants made which would embarrass Congress, having done it, by any claim of extraordinary expenditure incurred which should be considered in connection with the grant.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my idea about the facts of the situation is just this: If the Senate should see fit to adopt my amendment, the joint resolution, being a Senate joint resolution, will go to the House and be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House object to the amendment, they can strike it out and pass the joint resolution in amended form, and send it back here; and I shall make no opposition to concurrence in the action of the House if it takes that action and strikes it out.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But the Senator's amendment would give additional rights to water power over those intended to be given by the original joint resolution, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would not give any additional rights to anybody over any power.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say, additional rights to use it, then.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would give them an opportunity to use the water which the joint resolution says they can use.

Mr. SAULSBURY. By installing machinery which the original joint resolution practically prohibited.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It practically prohibited it; and that provision, may I say to the Senator, was put in by the House of Representatives or in conference, and not by the Senate. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is a little in error when he says that the joint resolution which he offers this morning is exactly as I asked it a year ago. It is not.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as one who participated in the House in this legislation and approved of the provisos which the amendment now pending seeks to eliminate, I think I ought to make a short statement of the viewpoint that was taken of this legislation in the House at that time and bring to the attention of the Senate the original purpose for which this legislation was asked.

The original joint resolution was asked for solely upon the ground that the Canadian authorities, on account of the war, had seen fit to commandeer for their own war purposes the power generated upon the Canadian side that had been utilized by these industries upon the American side, and that unless they were permitted to use so much of this additional 4,400 cubic feet as would make up that loss of power some of those industries would be compelled to close. That was the consideration, and the only consideration, that was presented to the House for this legislation; and the provisos that were incorporated in the measure in the House were for the purpose only of limiting the effect of the legislation to the purposes for which the legislation was asked. There was the additional consideration, and I think it is an important one, that we ought not to create additional rights by temporary legislation of this sort. It was represented to the House—whether correctly or not I do not know, but it was represented—that so long as the industries at Niagara using these powers could continue to use their powers through temporary permits they would oppose rather than favor permanent legislation dealing with this subject, and that they ought not through temporary permits to be given the right to use the entire 20,000 feet, because, if once given that right, there would be no incentive upon their part to submit to reasonable and proper permanent legislation governing the diversion of this 20,000 feet.

It seems to me what ought to be done, and it ought to be done at this session, is to enact permanent legislation upon the subject of Niagara Falls; but I very much fear that if this amendment is adopted it will impede that permanent legislation rather than facilitate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4017) for the relief of Catherine Grace, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 482) thereon.

Mr. BECKHAM, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 4366) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1913 (38 Stats.

L., pp. 4, 75), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 481) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3269) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John H. Armstrong, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 483) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4670) for the control and regulation of the use of the waters of the Niagara River, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4671) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4672) to regulate the interstate use of automobiles and all self-propelled vehicles which use the public highways in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present a petition and brief of the pressmen of the Government Printing Office asking for an increase of compensation. In connection with it I introduce a bill, by request, and ask that it and the petition be referred to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona (by request):

A bill (S. 4673) to increase the compensation of pressmen in the Government Printing Office (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 4674) granting an increase of pension to George E. Tracy; and

A bill (S. 4675) granting a pension to Missouri B. Perea (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILFLEY:

A bill (S. 4676) granting an increase of pension to Julia Carey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4677) for the protection of lands and property in the Palo Verde Valley, Cal., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 235) to amend the rules of the Senate relating to the limitation of debate, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there are now in conference certain important pension bills, in which most of us are interested, and it is desired to have immediate consideration of them. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is chairman of the Committee on Pensions, is necessarily absent on account of illness. The Senate will find the bills set forth on pages 15 and 16 of the calendar. There is one on page 15, being House bill 7634, and there are eight bracketed together on page 16. At the request of the Senator from Montana, I ask unanimous consent that he be relieved from service as one of the conferees on the conference committees on these bills and that the Chair appoint a substitute in his place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Montana is relieved from further service as a conferee on the part of the Senate, and the Chair appoints the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to fill the vacancy.

INSPECTORS OF STEAM VESSELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1544) to provide for appeals from the decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "pecuniarily" and insert "directly"; on page 1, line 3, after "in" to insert "or affected"; on page 1, line 4, to strike out "steam"; on page 1, line 5, to strike out "himself"; on page 1, line 7, to strike out the comma and insert a semicolon; on page 2, line 3, to strike out the comma; on page 2, line 8, to strike out the comma; on page 2, line 10, after "same," to strike out ", and any," and insert ". Any"; on page 2, line 10, after "may," to insert "within 30 days thereafter"; on page 2, line 12, to strike out the comma; on page 2, line 13, after "may," insert "within 30 days thereafter"; on page 2, line 20, to strike out "section" and insert "sections"; on page 2, line 20, after "one," insert "and two"; on page 2, line 22, to strike out the comma; on page 3, line 1, after "witness," to strike out the comma; on page 3, line 1, after "summoned," to strike out the comma; on page 3, line 2, after "attendance," to strike out the comma and to amend the title so as to read "An act to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 3547. An act to extend the provisions of the pension act of May 11, 1912, to the officers and enlisted men of all State militia and other State organizations that rendered service to the Union cause during the Civil War for a period of 90 days or more, and providing pensions for their widows, minor children, and dependent parents, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

H. R. 10297. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. R. 11284. An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call up Senate resolution 253.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest that the resolution is not in order under the head of routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Chair did not hear the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The suggestion is that the call of the Senator from Idaho is not in order until after the close of the routine morning business; and I only say it because I have a resolution that I desire to submit.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to the Senator from Iowa offering his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made by the Senator from Iowa is well taken.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a few weeks ago, on May 21, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] reported Senate bill 130, a bill introduced by me, and I supposed it was understood that I would prepare the report. The clerk of the committee, however, did not so understand it, and the report accompanying it was the same as the one submitted on the bill introduced two years before. I desire now to submit a report (No. 449) to take the place of Senate Report No. 449, heretofore submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Michigan is granted, and the substitution will be made.

PRODUCTION OF GASOLINE.

Mr. CUMMINS. I submit a Senate resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration. I think there will be no debate whatever upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 259), as follows:

Whereas it is asserted by reliable persons that Mr. S. M. Herber, of St. Joseph, Mo., has discovered a process of extracting from petroleum or fuel oil gasoline and other motor fuel in greatly increased quantities and at much less cost than the process now in use; and

Whereas the discoverer of the said process has submitted to certain officers of the Government an offer to demonstrate the value of the process to the Government and to the people without expense other than the presence of such experts as might be selected by the Government; and

Whereas this offer has not yet been accepted and there is immediate necessity of increasing the output of motor fuel and decreasing, if possible, the cost to the users: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures be directed to make an investigation of the subject, including the denial of a patent to the said Herber for a process of extracting gasoline from petroleum, and to report to the Senate thereon as soon as practicable the information acquired and its recommendations with respect to the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why it is necessary to have this resolution passed?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if there is going to be debate on this matter, I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. There will be no debate on it. I am simply asking a question of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. A question is debate. If there is going to be any discussion about it, I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can object if he desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the resolution will lie over until to-morrow, or until it is called up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF STOCKYARDS.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a resolution calling for information, and for which I ask present consideration. I am sure that it will not bring on any discussion or debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska submits a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 258) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director General of Railroads be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate the following information:

First. What action, if any, has been taken, or is contemplated by the Director General of Railroads, in regard to the taking over, as part of the railroad system of the country, the stockyards and stockyards railway terminals at the various packing centers?

Second. Has the Director General of Railroads authority under existing laws to take over said stockyards, and if not, what additional legislation is necessary?

Third. What information, if any, has the Director General of Railroads regarding the ownership and control of said stockyards, and what, if any, connection has such ownership and control with the ownership and control of the packing industries of the country?

AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY, MISSOULA COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. MYERS. I present a memorial to the Senate from the Missoula County (Mont.) American Defense Society. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, what is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana presents a memorial, and asks that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. A memorial from whom, and for what?

Mr. MYERS. A memorial to the United States Senate from the American Defense Society of Missoula County, Mont. I believe that under the rule it is permitted to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How long is it?

Mr. MYERS. It is not a very long memorial. I do not see, though, what difference it makes how long or how short it is if the rule permits it to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I object to having it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MYERS. I submit to the Presiding Officer the question whether or not a memorial is entitled to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The memorial is not from the legislature of a State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the parliamentarian at the desk that the memorial does not come within the rule. Were the memorial from a State legislature or some other legislative body, it would be printed in the RECORD, under the rule. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana that this memorial be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have made the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have heard the statement made on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and also by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that memorials and petitions directed and addressed to Congress were entitled to be printed in the RECORD. I am not an adept on the rules of this body; in fact, it is hard to find out what the rules are; but I have heard that stated by those two Senators, and acting on the faith of that statement, I presented this as a memorial to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon me, the Chair will state that, under the rule, the memorial is entitled to be noted in the RECORD, but not to be set forth in haec verba.

Mr. MYERS. I ask leave to withdraw the memorial, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial is withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I read paragraph 5 of Rule VII:

Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate.

That means, referred to a committee.

I read paragraph 1 of Rule XXIX:

Every motion to print documents, reports, and other matter transmitted by either of the executive departments, or to print memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except bills of the Senate or House of Representatives, resolutions submitted by a Senator, communications from the legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing or select committees of the Senate, shall, unless the Senate otherwise orders, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

That is the rule.

Mr. MYERS. I supposed that the memorial would be referred to some committee, of course. I have no objection to its reference to a committee and intended that it should be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator desires it to be presented and referred to the appropriate committee?

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not present it at this time. I said in asking to have it printed I was relying on the statement I have heard made on the floor as to the rule by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

DATA RELATIVE TO PROFITEERING AND THE REVENUE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. I understood that when the Senate adjourned several days ago there was pending a motion to consider Senate resolution 235. I ask the Chair for a ruling as to whether that resolution is now before the Senate or whether it requires a renewal of the motion to bring the matter before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will pardon the Chair. The Chair was advised by the Vice President just before the present occupant of the chair was called to the position that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] at the close of the morning hour is entitled to the floor under the rules. I was not familiar with the status of the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho a day or two ago which went over under the rule.

Mr. BORAH. May I say to the Senator from Alabama, in the event of his motion being the unfinished business, if that is the contention the Senator makes, I have no desire to disturb it, and I can avoid that by asking unanimous consent to consider the resolution, upon which there will be no debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I of course have no desire in the world to interfere with his resolution. On Senate resolution 235 there was considerable debate upon the question of its consideration. I will not call it a filibuster. Of course, I expect and intend to push the resolution. If the resolution that the Senator presents were to bring on debate and delay I would move the present consideration of Senate resolution 235, as it is 2 o'clock and I have a right to make that motion under the rule, but if it is not going to bring on debate, I do not object.

Mr. BORAH. If it causes debate, I will not insist on its consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 253.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us find out what the resolution is. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BORAH on the 31st ultimo, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

First. Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the Treasury Department relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes.

Second. The figures showing the amount of money which the Government has raised up to this time since the beginning of the war by taxation and the amount which it has raised by loans.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Idaho. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to offer an amendment, which is offered after a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Finance. The amendment is agreeable to me, and therefore I offer it as a part of the resolution. The amendment is as follows: In line 9, after the word "statutes," insert a semicolon and the following:

that such report shall contain a list of all corporations with the amount of their earnings which have earned in excess of 15 per cent on their capital stock as shown by their returns to the Internal-Revenue Bureau for the calendar year 1917, accompanied by such statement as will show net earnings of the same corporation for the calendar year 1916.

I offer that amendment in completion of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to discuss the resolution, and if no one else wishes to discuss it, I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, when the matter just disposed of came up I made an inquiry. I desire to have the status properly fixed as to whether the motion pending several days ago is before the Senate and comes up now, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, or whether it requires a renewal of that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it died, if he may be permitted the expression, and would not automatically be presented to the Senate but would require a new motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as I am to leave the city this afternoon to fill an engagement this evening, a few observations I beg to be permitted to indulge in reference to the motion of the Senator from Alabama, complying with the direction of the Committee on Rules, to bring before the Senate the consideration of a limit upon debate by prescribing a rule which shall have as a limit of debate a certain time, providing an exception wherever the circumstances justify that exception, through unanimous consent of the Senate or a majority vote.

Mr. President, I want to take the Senate into my confidence in an expression of an opinion of mine that may be profaning this ancient body.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very much interested in the resolution, as we all are, and I know the Senator wants to discuss it. As far as I know, the resolution does not contain any provision that further time may be given upon a majority vote. I simply wanted to call the Senator's attention to that fact.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota that the latter observation of mine applies to the proposed amendments tendered, I believe, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and another, I believe, by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. If they have not been tendered, then I am inaccurate in stating that they are on the table.

Mr. President, a very interesting change has come over this body. Why should there not be a rule putting a limit on discussion? This body has proceeded since I have been a Member of it either directly to the subject or directly leading away from the subject that has been before it.

Mr. President, this is not the Senate of 20 years ago, nor after the Civil War, nor the Senate preceding the Mexican War, nor the Senate that assembled in the early days of our existence. There are orators in this body, but there are no orations. The times have so changed and the conditions of the public mind have been so transformed that if Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and John C. Calhoun were Members of this body they would not receive audience upon any of the speeches that are to-day renowned from the school-boy utterance or quoted by statesmen from public places. If Daniel Webster were a Member of this body and attempted in this day one of his guttural reverberating echoes of philosophic statesmanship with his preliminary exordium and weighty observations, the Members would flee him for their lunch or an appropriate card would be handed that some one was waiting for them in the lobby. Barring the single conclusion of the reply to Hayne familiar to our mind as the expression of a Union, one and inseperable, there is no debate of Mr. Webster that could have been delivered in this body as it was delivered that would have received the audience of the whole Senate.

The speech which Henry Clay made in offering aid to the South American countries was the only utterance that I know from him that would have been listened to by the present temper of this body, and if John C. Calhoun had attempted to contribute his philosophic disquisition upon the relative relations of States and the National Government in a manner such as he did during those days, sir, he would be lucky if the pages remained, far less the intelligent Members of the body, because the habit of this body has been to flee every discussion until it reaches the final stage; then the statement of its opposition, and then the vote as to its conclusion.

Mr. President, may I offer you some proof, painful for me to confess and to this body to accuse? There was tendered in this body a resolution to declare war against the Imperial Government of Germany. The resolution involved the life or death of our institutions, and, sir, truth must admit that upon that resolution there was not one oration delivered on this floor that will ever be quoted by historians as a model of eloquence or as an inspiration to patriotism. There was not one speech delivered which will be referred to by professors of elocution as a model of literature or an example of diction. So hasty is this body to quickly hear the discussion, to spread defiance to opposition, or to gather intelligence in the daily newspaper while a man speaks to the Senate, that in order to give time to an oration would be to take from debate the convenience which heretofore Members have enjoyed in interrupting a Senator at will and departing from him at pleasure.

Mr. President, why, then, shall we continue a privilege which none of us enjoy? If the ancients had lived in this day they could get no audience in the Senate. Cicero's speech in impeachment of Cataline would have been heard in this body because it was the denunciation of a human being in a charge against a party, a reflection upon character; but had Pericles attempted to deliver his famous speech on the return of the soldiers from Salamis, as he had prepared it and read it from manuscript and unrolled it from two spools, this body, noticing that it was manuscript, would have fled as blackbirds from a hunter. Demosthenes might have been heard a little while defending himself in the celebrated oration for the crown, but that was because we have a rule in rising to a personal privilege and we wait a little while to see what a man indicts himself upon or what particular thing he has dignified by notice. But in this particular our orations are not encouraged. The debate is as mathematical as if delivered in a court room upon a concise question of measurement in some engineering problem, and every gentleman here delights to have the press gallery understand that there is nothing he does not know on all subjects.

With such an attitude of complete confidence in ourselves as is often displayed when a man rises on the floor, save in rare exceptions, why shall we continue a privilege which has heretofore been enjoyed merely in the writing, but in the practice never participated in?

The question with us now is, Will we go to business at this critical hour and discharge it with terseness and then dismiss it when finished? We are on the eve of taking up the revenue bill. Every Senator knows how every other Senator is set upon by his constituency, that wants every other constituency taxed but itself, and who can always present most plausible and, I may say, convincing reasons why the taxes to be dealt with are unjust, always concluding its opposition and protest with, "I am patriotic and perfectly willing to be taxed, but not at this time and in this way."

Now, sir, in order that the bill may be reached, the provisions of it considered, and we move to it as a business proposition, this measure is brought in here that it may aid discussion, that it may facilitate deliberation, and bring to a speedy conclusion the object.

I support the measure because it is my judgment, sir, that nothing can be lost by placing a limit of time which invariably certainly is all we ever have consumed in the real discussion of a measure, and all that the Senate seems to tolerate. My theory of that matter can be best expressed as far as I am concerned and as I conclude my observation with a line of one of the Henrys, in which Shakespeare put in his mouth, that "A little more than enough is far too much." I support the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the matter be brought to the attention of the Senate and the resolution adopted.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am in favor of this resolution with an amendment. I do not approve the unanimous-consent part of it. The resolution proposes that during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate shall be amended by adding thereto the following: "That no Senator shall occupy more than one hour in debate unless by unanimous consent." I am opposed to the unanimous consent. I do not believe that any individual ought to be permitted to veto the powers of this body even in favor of brevity, which I greatly desire. I think it ought to be amended so as to say "unless by consent of the Senate." The Senate will always consent to hear any Senator who has anything to say. It is only to be applied when a Senator is gratifying his desire to speak against the will of his colleagues; it is only when he is using the floor to exploit his own opinions, his own fancies, and perhaps his own vanity, if I might say so without offense, because I think we all have more or less vanity, and it is not a bad quality. I agree with the learned and lovable Benjamin Franklin, who, in writing his autobiography, said: "I will not say as other authors have said, I may say this without vanity. In fact, I say it with considerable vanity. I have always regarded my vanity as a most gracious gift of Divine Providence. It has been my solace oftimes during life when every other friend had deserted me."

This floor has been sadly abused in the discussion of trivial matters, while matters of national and world-wide consequence ought to have occupied the most serious and the most earnest thinking and study of this great body. I hope the Senate will not continue its old régime of permitting one man to control the Senate. Minority rule is the bane of all governments. Minority rule is the cause of the cataclysm that now shakes civilization to its foundation. It is the rule of the Prussian few, the right of an Emperor with his little military circle around him to declare war, a circle moved by ambition, by desire for place and power, by desire to occupy the center of the world's stage as the masterful forces on earth. It is that minority rule that destroyed Poland. In the Polish Senate the body could not pass any law "except by unanimous consent." This destroyed Poland, as a fool or a mischief maker or an autocratic leader could prevent action.

The only safe path for republics is to let the majority control. The American Senate has now become more and more responsible to the will of the majority of the people of the United States, because we have advanced in recent years to a point where a Senator owes his return to this body by the voice of the majority in his own State, and let us devoutly thank the Great Giver of Good for that. It makes this body more responsive, and this body ought to respect the principle which lies at the base of the selection of Senators, the majority rule.

I want to say now that if the Republican Party were in control of this body I would gladly agree to the majority rule. I think the party which has the majority ought to have the responsibility and ought to have the power that goes with responsibility. Happily for us now there is practically a merger and a forgetfulness of party lines. We are in a gigantic war for the maintenance of civilization itself, and in the presence of that great danger we forget out petty differences at home. But on the question of majority rule I tell you Senators it is vital to the maintenance of civilization. We ought to gladly lay aside this old rule and permit the majority of this body to act. If you did that, there would be action on this floor instead of so much discussion, and we would not have all these vacant benches. I observed when this rule came up for discussion a day or two ago, after it had been discussed for an hour and a quarter, there were 15 Senators in this Chamber and 81 Senators absent. Is that a proper way to conduct the business of a great Government in time of war?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to have his amendments printed and lie on the table?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, without objection.

DISTILLATION OF LIQUORS, WAR-TIME PROHIBITION, ETC.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I give my hearty concurrence to what the Senator from Oklahoma has so forcefully said. I rise, however, for another purpose than that of addressing myself to the subject before the Senate.

I have here a letter from the President on the subject of war-time prohibition. It was written in answer to a letter from myself making inquiry as to his view of the matter. I ask to have it read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE.
Washington, May 28, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thank you very much for your letter of the 26th. Frankly, I was very much distressed by the action of the House. I do not think that it is wise or fair to attempt to put such compulsion on the Executive in a matter in which he has already acted almost to the limit of his authority. What is almost entirely overlooked is that there are, as I am informed, very large stocks of whisky in this country, and it seems to me quite certain that if the brewing of beer were prevented entirely, along with all the other drinks, many of them harmless, which are derived from food or feed stuffs, the consumption of whisky would be stimulated and increased to a very considerable extent.

My own judgment is that it is wise and statesmanlike to let the situation stand as it is for the present, until at any rate I shall be apprised by the Food Administration that it is necessary in the way suggested still further to conserve the supply of food and feed stuffs. The Food Administration has not thought it necessary to go any further than we have in that matter already gone.

I thank you most cordially, Senator, for your kindness in consulting me in this matter, which is of very considerable importance, and has a very direct bearing upon many collateral questions.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Food Administration was referred to in that letter, I submitted it to Mr. Hoover and received the following reply, which I ask to have read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 5, 1918.

The Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am greatly obliged for your letter of June 2, inclosing copy of letter which you received from the President, upon which you ask for some comment from me.

I have the feeling that the form in which the food act stands makes temperance issues and food conservation issues incapable of separation and in sharp conflict. You will recollect that the provisions of the food act of August 10, 1917, provides for six types of operations in connection with the liquor trade:

First. The immediate stopping of the distillation of liquor.

Second. The authority to commandeer any distilled spirits for redistillation so far as may be necessary to provide alcohol for munition requirements.

Third. The authority to regulate or stop the use of foodstuffs in the preparation of wines.

Fourth. The authority to regulate the use of foodstuffs in brewing beers.

Fifth. The authority to prohibit the use of foodstuffs entirely in brewing.

Under the first authority, distillation was stopped on September 10 throughout the country and there has been no use of foodstuffs since that date for this purpose. There proved to be in stock at the time distillation was stopped, somewhere between two and three years' supply of whisky, brandy, gin, etc., and this stock is in course of distribution, as the act provides only for the stoppage of new supplies.

Under the second authority, the War Industries Board have found no necessity for commandeering distilled spirits in the country for redistillation into munitions alcohol, and I am informed by them that there are technical difficulties in the way, as well as the fact that commercial alcohol can be obtained not only abundantly but on a much cheaper basis than could be had through commandeering and redistillation of potable spirits.

Under the third authority no action has been taken, because the wines produced in this country are from grapes, of which a very small proportion are available as table or raisin grapes, and therefore the stoppage of wine making would add no consequential amount of food to our national supplies. The conversion of vineyards to other production would not be likely so long as there is prospect of resumption of wine making at a later date. The conversion of these grapes to grape juice instead of wine, as suggested, would add nothing to our national food supplies.

Under the fourth authority, with regard to brewing, the alcoholic content in beer was reduced to 2¾ per cent, and the amount of grain and other foodstuffs that could be used has been limited to 70 per cent of that used during the corresponding period of the previous year, the effect being to stop any expansion of brewing and to reduce the foodstuffs consumed by 30 per cent. The actual amount of grain being used in the brewing of beers is at the present time approximately 4,500,000 bushels per month, of which approximately 30 per cent is recovered as cattle feed, and the loss therefore into the beer is practically the equivalent of 3,150,000 bushels per month, the grains used being barley, corn, and broken rice. There is, of course, a great deal of contention that the beer itself contains the remaining food values. But omitting this, the cessation of brewing would effect a saving in grain of approximately 3,150,000 bushels a month, from a nutritive point of view. It needs no comment from me, from a food point of view, that I should favor the saving of this amount of grain.

Under the fifth authority—that is, the stopping of brewing altogether—it does appear to me that there are temperance issues involved of such tremendous moment that they outweigh the use of the reduced amount of foodstuffs in brewing, and in any event give ground for a difference in judgment as to the alternative national risks and losses which need the most careful consideration. If brewing were stopped to-day, beer would disappear from the liquor trade within one or two months and the whole country would be put practically on a whisky, brandy, and gin basis, with some supplies of wine. The saloons would be left open and upon a basis of selling of drinks carrying 40 per cent or 50 per cent alcohol, with some small supplies of wine, instead of a large proportion of their customers being served with a drink of 2¾ per cent alcoholic content, and therefore, from a temperance viewpoint, much less harmful. It raises the very serious moral problem as to whether infinitely more damage will not result from such action than in a continuation of the use of this limited amount of foodstuffs in brewing.

It does appear to me that the losses in food are entirely secondary to the moral and physical dangers. The President's letter indicates his feeling in this particular.

You are probably aware that I have been a life-long believer in national temperance; on the other hand, as a purely administrative officer of the Government, I have felt strongly that I should not enter into any contentious matters.

Yours, faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Hoover gave his letter to the press on yesterday, and with it the statement which I also ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

As to the discussion over the suppression of brewing, I wish to say emphatically that from a strictly food conservation point of view I should like to see the use of foodstuffs suppressed in all drinks, hard and soft.

This is not, however, the whole story. We stopped distilling a year ago. There is a long supply of whisky, gin, and other 20 per cent to 40 per cent distilled drinks in the country. We have reduced the consumption of foodstuffs in brewing by 30 per cent and reduced the alcohol content of beer to 2¾ per cent.

If we stop brewing the saloons of the country will still be open, but confined practically to a whisky and gin basis. Any true advocate of temperance and of national efficiency in these times will shrink from this situation, for the national danger in it is greater than the use of some 4,000,000 bushels of grain monthly in the breweries.

If the American people want prohibition it should prohibit by legislation to that end and not force the Food Administration to the responsibility for an orgy of drunkenness. It is mighty difficult to get drunk on 2¾ per cent beer; it will be easy enough if we force a substitution of distilled drinks for it.

The Food Administration has gone as far as it can toward temperance without precipitating a worse situation. If the American people or Congress will stop the sale of distilled liquors the administration will find no difficulty in stopping brewing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to proceed with the consideration of Senate resolution 235.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, before we proceed with that resolution I desire to ask the Senator from Texas a question. As I understand, it is conceded by the Food Administrator that the stopping of the brewing of beer would conserve, at any rate, 54,000,000 bushels of grain. That would make quite a number of barrels of flour. Does the Senator from Texas approve the stand taken by the Food Administrator that it is better to let brewing go on than it is to conserve this grain for bread?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not, but I hardly think that could be a just statement of his position. He is in favor of complete and immediate prohibition of the sale of all intoxicating liquors, including whisky.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator from Texas will remember that when the committee of the Senate a year ago brought to this Chamber a prohibition measure, one which made it absolute, prohibiting the use of any article of food in the manufacture of alcoholic liquor, the administration requested that that measure should not be passed. Am I not correct in that statement?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The request was made by the President, because he said he had information that further insistence on the measure would imperil the entire food-control legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator from Texas and other leaders of the movement acquiesced in that request?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir; as I shall always continue to do when a measure which is thought necessary by the President to the proper conduct of the war is in the balance. This correspondence leads us to the conclusion that complete and universal prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors would not be considered an interference with war measures and would not be considered objectionable if Congress should enact such legislation on its own responsibility and on its own authority.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, does the Senator from Texas think that Congress would enact such legislation in opposition to the wish of the Chief Executive?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It would not be in opposition to him; he does not indicate in the letter I have presented any opposition to such a course at this session.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask the Senator another question. Is it not true that the President of the United States now has the power to close every brewery in this Nation, if he wants to do so, under the present law?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He has; but he says that such action would leave the country on a whisky basis.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I want to ask the Senator from Texas a question about this bill. I understand that it has come over from the other House and been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Has the Senator any knowledge when that committee will meet, why it has not met, and why it has not taken up the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The chairman of the committee has been absent and is still absent.

Mr. KENYON. Will he return during the session?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That I can not answer; but the member of the committee who is expected to preside at meetings of the committee in the chairman's absence is present—I refer to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]—and I think he intends to call the committee together in a day or two.

Mr. KENYON. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would enlighten me on that point.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, I hardly know just what to say. I was requested to take charge of certain legislation which was pending at the time the chairman of the committee left the city. In a measure of this kind, I take it for granted that a majority of the committee have the right, if they see fit to do so, to request a meeting of the committee; and, if they so request, I shall call such a meeting on the bill which is now pending; that is, in the absence of any action or intimation on the part of the chairman of the committee, I should be very glad to call the committee together on the bill that would involve this very question at any time that a majority of the members should indicate that they desired to have the matter considered. The reason I make this statement is because I am not advised by the chairman of the committee at what time he proposes to return.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator from South Carolina know whether the chairman of the committee proposes to return?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not know.

Mr. KENYON. If he does not return during the session, does that end the consideration of the measure?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say, for the information of the Senator from Iowa, that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], expects to return to the city.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator from North Dakota know when?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know when.

Mr. KENYON. I should think the committee might very well consider this bill, even if the chairman is not here.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I heartily agree with the Senator to the effect that important legislation should not be allowed to lapse on account of the absence of the chairman of the committee. As the ranking member of the committee, if the committee so desires and that desire is indicated, I shall call a meeting of the committee for the consideration of the measure.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply desire to say, in view of the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, in justice to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that he indicated to me before he went away that at any time the committee wanted a meeting he hoped that members of the committee would confer; and, as I understood him, he expected the Senator from South Carolina to call the committee together.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am glad the Senator from North Dakota has made that statement. I do not recall the Senator from Oklahoma having made such a communication to me, except in reference to the bill that is now pending before the committee. He asked me at any time that it was convenient to call the committee together to consider that piece of legislation. As to the other general legislation that may come before the committee, I am very glad the Senator from North Dakota has made that statement, and I shall hold myself in readiness to call the committee whenever they see fit to ask it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the bill in which the subject matter of this discussion is to be treated is not before the Senate at this time for consideration, and I would not make any observations upon the subject if I were not fearful that my silence might be misconstrued.

I am not in favor of treating the question of stopping the manufacture of beer or the consumption of foodstuffs for that purpose, or for the sale of whisky or anything of that kind by indirect legislation, by attaching it upon some other measure and making it a condition precedent to the enforcement of the law. I believe in going after the matter directly, and my views on the question have not changed since this matter was up before the Senate some months ago. I thought that it was inexcusable, indefensible, a crime against morality and the necessities of the people to convert foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors when the women and children of the world are starving for something to eat—something with which to sustain the body. Where is the justification, I submit, Mr. President, for the conversion of foodstuffs which promote health, give vigor and strength to the body, into a poison which not only kills the body but damns the soul? How can we justify such a misuse of one of the prime necessities of life when the women and children of America, our soldiers in the trenches of France, and our allies across the water are crying for food?

I do not think there is any merit in the argument that the manufacture of beer promotes temperance; that 4,000,000 bushels of grain converted into beer every month, added to the whisky already distilled, will promote soberness in the land. I can not follow that process of reasoning to anything resembling a logical conclusion. A glass of beer excites the appetite for drink; it is just that much more fuel to the flame of intemperance that is burning in the bodies of the American people. If the arguments advanced by the President and Mr. Hoover are sound, Congress made a mistake when it prevented the sale of beer in the District of Columbia or anywhere else in the Republic. I am sorry to see the suggestion made at this time, for if there ever was a moment in the history of the world when every moral law should be observed, when temperance should be taught and practiced among the people, now, above all others, is the time. There is no excuse, in my judgment, for the people of the United States, for Congress, permitting the brewers to convert 4,000,000 bushels of foodstuffs per month into beer in order to satisfy an unhealthy thirst.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator inform us how many bushels of grain our starving allies are using in the manufacure of beer and malt liquors?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not know; I can not answer that question, but I think it is quite as inexcusable in our allies using foodstuffs to make this poisonous beverage as it would be for the people of the United States to do it. I am not willing that our people should perpetrate that egregious mistake because somebody else has done it or is doing it.

We all know the influences that are working in this country in order to induce the Government to extend this special privilege to the brewers. To my mind, the motive behind it all is clear and unmistakable. If I had the power, I should prohibit the sale of liquor, whisky, and beer in every State, town, and county throughout this Republic. I have voted that way since I came to the Senate, and, so help me, God, I shall not weary in well-doing along those lines.

Mr. President, I simply want to say this much, in order that my silence might not be misconstrued: I made up my mind many years ago to strike the liquor traffic whenever it came within reach. It is an insidious enemy to the human race; it is an outlaw against good government, and I shall feel justified in using almost any means within my power, within constitutional limitations, to destroy it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Just one further word. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as is the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], as is the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and as are other Senators; and I desire to say that I shall be glad, as a member of that committee, to cooperate with the other members in having a meeting as soon as possible in order that this question may not suffer from any delay.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] referred to some bill that is before the committee as to which the chairman of the committee did speak to him about calling the committee together to consider. Will the Senator tell us what that bill is, if he has it in mind?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator from Washington misunderstood me. I said the Senator from Oklahoma had asked me, as I was on the committee of conference between the two Houses, to call the committee together on the pending Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator did not refer to the conference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But he had not indicated that he desired me to call the committee together to consider the bills that were sent to the committee in due course.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the motion I have made to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to proceed to the consideration of the resolution named by him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	King	Nugent
Borah	Harding	Kirby	Page
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Lenroot	Pittman
Chamberlain	Hollis	Lewis	Poindexter
Cummins	Johnson, Cal.	Lodge	Pomerene
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	McCumber	Ransdell
Dillingham	Jones, N. Mex.	McKellar	Saulsbury
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	McNary	Shafroth
Fletcher	Kellogg	Martin	Sheppard
France	Kendrick	Nelson	Sherman
Gronna	Kenyon	Norris	Shields
Simmons	Sterling	Townsend	Watson
Smith, Md.	Sutherland	Trammell	Willey
Smith, Mich.	Swanson	Underwood	Wolcott
Smith, S. C.	Thompson	Vardaman
Smoot	Tillman	Wadsworth

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235, Calendar No. 432.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules with an amendment, to strike out the entire resolution and insert the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"That no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution and not over 20 minutes on each amendment proposed thereto."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the resolution presented by the Senator from Alabama being now the business before the Senate, I desire to have read an amendment which I have offered to it and to which I desire to address my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following as a new section:

SEC. —. That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session unless four-fifths of the Members of the Senate by yea-and-nay vote shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

That this rule shall not be limited to the period of the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer the amendment for immediate consideration?

Mr. BORAH. I tender it as an amendment and desire to speak to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to state his understanding of the parliamentary situation. The resolution has been reported by the committee with an amendment, which amendment is at present pending. To that amendment the Senator from Idaho offers an amendment which has been read.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the first question will be upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have also an amendment, which has been presented, in regard to the time when the one hour allowed for debate may be occupied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is not yet pending. The Senator from Idaho secured recognition, and his amendment will be first considered.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; I give notice of my proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator who offered the amendment if the words "that this rule shall not be limited to the period of the war" apply to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama as well as to the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. The provision to which the Senator refers is found in my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The amendment offered by the Senator provides "that this rule shall not be limited to the period of the war." That refers merely to the amendment and does not refer to the resolution as a whole?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that the rule as reported by me provides that it shall be limited to the period of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is a story associated with the treaty of 1871 between France and Germany which throws much light upon the methods of secret diplomacy. France was anxious to secure a retrocession of Belfort, an Alsatian fortress. One of the French plenipotentiaries was a shrewd, persevering man of business, a student of human nature, by the name of Pouyer-Quertier. The representatives of the great powers had sat late into the night. Bismarck finally announced that he was desirous of retiring and made ready to go. But Pouyer-Quertier insisted upon another bottle of wine, and Bismarck finally yielded. Before the bottle was finished Belfort had been receded to France. For nearly three centuries in secret chambers in the midst of conviviality and for reasons wholly disassociated with the interest or welfare of the people concerned, peoples and nations have been handed about. The question which is now engaging the attention of practically the entire civilized world is how long that system can prevail, how long shall it be permitted to be the method by which international affairs shall be adjusted, and the rights, fortunes, and lives of the peoples determined? Will the world in the face of this awful catastrophe ever again permit the interests and relations of nations to be determined without full knowledge to those who must meet with all they have the crisis when it comes?

It is against this policy of secret diplomacy that the United States has raised its voice through its President, and it is the question upon which the Senate will now be called upon to pass. The most pronounced step that can be taken in addition to anything which has been said or done, or any step which has been taken, is that of the Senate with reference to the subject matter covered by this proposed amendment. There can be no mistake as to the attitude of this body should it fail to incorporate in its rules at this time a principle which will be an advanced step in the matter of open diplomacy. Under our form of government and the manner and method of making and concluding treaties the attitude of the Senate becomes important, and it will be distinctly announced by the position which it takes at this time.

The executive department, Mr. President, the other part of the treaty-making power, as I called to the attention of the Senate the other day, has announced its position in regard to this matter, and it now devolves upon the Senate to define its attitude not only as a practical question but as a moral proposition in the propaganda which is going forth in favor of open diplomacy. Here all the fruits of diplomacy, so far as our country is concerned are gathered in the form of treaties. We are an indispensable part of the treaty-making power. It is important, therefore, that our attitude be known.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator define a little more exactly what he means by "open diplomacy" and by "secret diplomacy." Does he mean to stand as an advocate of entire publicity in the negotiation of treaties or does he mean to advocate simply that the discussion in connection with the ratification of treaties shall be public? Is it not a fact that a large part of the evil of so-called secret diplomacy as existing in the past is that many treaties were not only made in secret but were kept secret after once made?

Mr. BORAH. That is a very distinct and pronounced evil which has its foundation in the other proposition that they are first made in secrecy. It is less an evil to keep in secrecy a concluded treaty than to negotiate it in secret; nevertheless when it has once become binding it is too late for the people's voice to be heard with effect. I will say to the Senator that it is not very material to a people to have the publication of a treaty if its entire negotiation has been carried on in secrecy up to the point where they are bound by it as a nation. If the powers operating in secrecy proceed to the point where the treaty has become valid and binding, there is not much consolation to the people in knowing what it is after it has reached the point where their mouths are closed and they are estopped as a practical matter from any proceeding whatever. Therefore, to begin with, we must have open discussion of the treaties before they are concluded and before they become binding upon the nations which are interested in the particular treaties.

I would be perfectly willing to concede what I presume the Senator is driving at, that there may be some steps in the negotiations between the negotiating parties which at times ought to be treated in secret; I am willing to assume that for the sake of the argument; but the secrecy never should extend to the point where the policy of a nation may be determined prior to open, full discussion and consideration upon the part of the treaty-making power. A treaty which establishes the policy or political course of a people ought to be open in its consideration from the very beginning. While evils may be conjured up in fancy with reference to the open consideration of the negotiation in some stages of it, those evils, in my judgment, are infintely less than the evils which flow from secrecy. In weighing one against the other I have no difficulty myself in arriving at the conclusion that open diplomacy with reference to all matters which result in a final treaty or the shaping of a policy for people is the only proper procedure in this day and age of the world to establish the relationship of nations.

I was about to say that the executive, the other branch of the treaty-making power of the Government, had defined the position which it holds with reference to this matter. The President, in his address to Congress on January 8, 1918, said that the first item of the only possible program of the world's peace was—

> Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

There is no limitation upon that, Mr. President, as to open negotiation, consideration, or discussion. In view of the fact that it is a statement made by that part of the Government which would be more likely than the Senate of the United States to be called upon to act in secrecy in the origin of the proceedings, I take it that for the purpose of this discussion we can accept the President's view as to what constitutes open diplomacy. In any event his statement is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. President, this is not a new subject. It is one about which men have been thinking and writing, and upon which much has been said during the last 10 years. Many of the statements with reference to the evils of secret diplomacy come from those who have had much to do with the subject and who have given a vast amount of study to the subject at close range. I am going to-day to deal principally with these views rather than attempt an original discussion. I do so for one reason particularly, because I want the opponents to understand the widespread interest which the subject has aroused.

The London Daily News, in an editorial shortly before the commencement of the war, said:

> Can Europe ever again tolerate the appalling peril of secret diplomacy? It belongs to the traditions of autocratic and personal government; it has no place in a democratic world.

That was a statement made before the most pronounced evil of secret diplomacy with which the world is familiar had been exposed to men, to wit, the present war. I do not contend, as has been often stated by men more familiar with the subject than I, that every war in Europe for the last hundred years can be traced to the evil consequences of secret diplomacy. But I do say, without hesitancy, that every war in Europe for the last hundred years has had, as a contributing and impelling cause, the evils of secret diplomacy. It has entered into every conflict and has tended to bring about every war in which Europe has been engaged even as far back as the treaty of Westphalia. Whether or not one could sustain the position that it has been the moving cause or the sole cause is not necessary for us here to discuss, but very few students of the subject will deny that it has been a powerfully contributing cause to these many conflicts. I think, furthermore, no man can study the history of the present war, its origin and cause, without coming to the conclusion that it had its origin almost wholly and exclusively in secret diplomacy.

Had the consideration of these questions, even after the ultimatum to Serbia, been conducted in the open, before the entire world, with the sunlight of publicity beating in upon those people who were fomenting war and speculating in the lives of nations, the war would, I believe, have been averted. When we now reflect upon the visit of Lord Haldane to Germany, for instance, prior to the beginning of this war, and the action upon the part of the representatives of the several Governments, the dishonest, sinister, scheming of the dynasty of Germany playing under cover of secrecy, one can but conclude that this hellish conflict could have its birth nowhere outside of secrecy and darkness; the open light of day would have exposed it to premature death—secrecy is always the handmaiden of crime.

An eminent writer of England, who has written much upon this subject, says:

> To effect progress toward the establishment of arbitration two things are necessary: First, the establishment of democratic rule by the political enfranchisement of all men and women; and second, the abolition of secret diplomacy, the chief weapon of despotism, and the source of misunderstandings and war.

The London Times, in an editorial in 1912, said:

> Who, then, makes war? The answer is to be found in the chancelleries of Europe among the men who have too long played with human lives as pawns in a game of chess, who have become so enmeshed in formulae and the jargon of diplomacy that they have ceased to be conscious of the poignant realities with which they trifle, and thus war will continue to be made until the great masses who are the sport of professional schemers and dreamers say the word which shall bring not eternal peace—for that is impossible—but a determination that war shall be fought only in a just and righteous and vital cause.

Mr. President, what is the real contest at this time as we view it? We have been loath to believe, as a people, that the mass of the German people would had they known all and been free to act, have sanctioned this war. I do not mean a popular vote—I mean that if they could have known what was going on in secret with a view of bringing on the war. There was a powerful propaganda put forth in Germany immediately following the declaration of war to convince the mass of the German people that war had been forced upon Germany. That propaganda was essential to secure from the German people the support that was necessary and essential to carry on the war. They were made to believe that every effort on the part of the Hohenzollerns, or the dynasty, had been made to preserve peace. They knew nothing about the facts. It was all a matter of secrecy, confined to the chambers where the chancellors sit, and therefore the representations which could be made by the ruling power to the German people could not be confuted and have not been confuted until this day, because those who are now in possession of the facts and able to confute them have not up to this time been able to reach the German people.

Had the German people been permitted to know the facts as they existed, had they been familiar with the scheme which was being carried out by their rulers and been permitted to judge of the facts as they developed from day to day it would have been a powerful factor against war even in Germany.

We are attacking the dynasty because of its secret control of its Government and thereby its power to effectuate disturbances in Europe. I do not see how we can hesitate for a moment to go on record as being opposed to publishing to our own people that which I verily believe, had it been published even to the German people, subject as they are to the control of their dynasty, would have resulted in staying this conflict. And not only would it have had a staying effect among the German people, but the moral force of the world would have been aroused to crush the movement.

Another editorial from a leading London paper, the Standard, of August 3, 1914, says:

> We do not know what sort of children our grandchildren will be, but if they are at all like ourselves they will recall with astonishment how Europe went to war in 1914 without passion or hatred or malice; how between two and three hundred millions of people set out to slaughter one another in a fatalistic way merely because the diplomatists had arranged things so. * * * The powers of Europe are at each other's throats in obedience to a barren diplomatic formula.

Mr. President, this war did not have its origin among the peoples of any country. There was no passion coming up from the great mass of those who must fight and die in this war demanding the war. There was no familiarity with facts which enabled them even to have an opinion upon the matter. They moved up to the slaughter pen as thoroughly dumb driven by the secret diplomatic powers of certain European governments as the dumb brute goes to the shambles. There was not a note in Europe among the masses of the people anywhere favoring war. There was not a discordant passion among those now in battle line in Europe anywhere for this war. Those upon whom the burden falls entertained no enmity toward those whom they are now slaughtering. They were brought to the clash by the power which has been permitted for 300 years to carry on its schemes and its ambitions behind closed doors and to tie its peoples by obligations and schemes with which the peoples had nothing to do. The greatest war of all history was begun not to preserve liberty, but to destroy it, and the scheme was hatched in the chancelleries of Europe. While these secret agents schemed the people toiled on in fancied security, without hatred or passion, until the secret conspiracy turned loose its dogs of war "in obedience to a barren diplomatic formula."

So I say, sir, that there has not been announced in this great controversy a proposition which goes more thoroughly to the heart of the controversy than the proposition which the President announced, that a prerequisite to any permanent peace is that hereafter no such thing shall happen; that hereafter the people shall be consulted; and the only way in which they can be consulted is by their knowing the different steps which their representatives take from day to day and month to month and year to year in their relations with other nations. Without realizing this as one of the fruits of the war, we can never enjoy real security.

I now refer to an article by Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, the able editor of the New York Evening Post. The article is entitled "The case against secret diplomacy." I shall not take the time of the Senate to read it all, although it is well worth full perusal and discussion. I shall read only such paragraphs as may be sufficient to elucidate further the subject before us.

Mr. Villard says:

> It is partly because of a secret understanding that England went into the war originally—the pledge to aid France in the event of war with Germany, which was not only unknown to the British public, but had even been withheld from a large portion of the English cabinet. Now, that understanding may or may not have been wise; it is quite likely that if it had not existed Great Britain would still have flung herself into the war because of her outraged feelings over the rape of Belgium, which must ever remain about the blackest crime in history. But the point is that a most grievous wrong was done to the English people in keeping them in darkest ignorance as to what had been tacitly agreed upon in their name and in the name of the people of France. The plain people in neither country had any chance to discuss or to approve it, nor had their parliamentarians. Yet they were bound by it, so much so that England's national existence had to be staked upon it. Not even the most ardent advocate of the allied cause will, it is to be hoped, defend this procedure. The more we detest German diplomacy and the international wickedness of it, the more must we feel that the principle of all such secret international procedure is absolutely wrong. And the chief reason for this is that the responsibility which secret diplomacy puts upon a small number of finite mortals is too great. They are only ordinary mortals, these diplomats, some of them more stupid than the ordinary person. They have lived in an atmosphere of deceit, concealment, intrigue, and corruption. More than that, they are tied up with red tape and obsessed with formulas.

A suggestion of that paragraph is that when a people are called upon to sustain a treaty or to take part in a conflict between their nation and some other they are utterly untrained either in thought or in purpose with reference to the nature of the conflict and unprepared either to reject war or go forward with intelligence and spirit. When this war began, in England the first six months of the war was devoted almost exclusively to arousing the English people to the real situation. They had to be advised of things they were entitled to know long before. Almost every conceivable method of propaganda was adopted in order to bring the morale and the spirit of the English people up to the point of cooperation and solidarity in the support of the war. If they are permitted to be familiar with their relationship to other governments, they are prepared at all times either to approve or to disapprove of the conduct of their Government. In no instance in this conflict were the people themselves informed as to the nature of the controversy or as to the reasons why they should be called into such a conflict; and every single nation which entered into the war had to indulge in the same propaganda to familiarize its people with that with which they should have been familiar from the beginning, not only giving them the power to stay the proceeding of the conflict, if it was unjust and unrighteous, but to support it in case it was just and righteous, and to support it with vigor and with efficiency from the hour that the conflict arose. Whether the war is to be stayed because it is unjust, or whether it is to be vigorously supported because it is just, the people nevertheless are entitled to the information—essential to righteous and intelligent action in both cases. I believe that many wars would be stayed; indeed, the people do not make war. But if war must sometimes come, who are more entitled to all the facts in the long train of incidents than those who must sustain it when it does come?

I can conceive of no matter of more importance to the people, with which they should be more familiar, than that of their relationship to the other nations. In this country we submit almost every conceivable complex question to the masses of the people, and they act upon it either direct or through their representatives. Almost every conceivable problem goes to them in some way through their elections—questions which are more complicated, more complex, and more difficult of solution than most international questions, and yet not so much depends upon their solution. The very life of the Nation, all their energy, their means, material and otherwise, are at the call of the Nation when the hour comes; and if there is any one question with which they should be familiar it is that which involves all they have. Domestic questions affect them seriously enough, but only proportionately to the seriousness of their relationship to other nations.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator's logic drive him to the conclusion that there should be a vote taken in this country as to whether or not we shall go to war?

Mr. BORAH. That is a question aside from this matter.

Mr. WATSON. That is a matter on which I wanted to get the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. BORAH. I am dealing now only with the question of open diplomacy. What should be the framework of our own Government as to how war should be declared is a domestic question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Our form of government contemplates action through its representatives; and if the people are thoroughly informed of the facts, their representatives will ultimately represent them. In other words, they express their approval or disapproval with reference to this matter the same as they do with reference to the tariff, with reference to taxation, or with reference to any other subject.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator believe that at the time of our declaration of war the people of this country were thoroughly informed as to all of the reasons why we were entering upon it?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think they knew much about it—that is, I would not say when we made the declaration—but up to the time that the President delivered his address and revealed the facts upon which we were compelled to act—the real reasons for going to war. In my judgment, the people had not enjoyed sufficiently the facts necessitating action, and it is my view we have suffered materially by reason of that fact. We see now as the tide of patriotism is rising from day to day, and as the facts are more and more revealed to them and the situation more fully understood, what magnificent unity and resolve they disclose. In my humble judgment, had these matters been thoroughly discussed and thoroughly known to them they would have started out with the same zeal which they now exhibit, when the facts are more and more revealed to them as the war proceeds. The American people are perfectly capable of forming sound and intelligent conclusions on these questions, and, be assured, American honor will not suffer at their hands.

Mr. WATSON. But what I am trying to get at, if the Senator will pardon me, is how this matter of open diplomacy would have cured a situation of that character in our country. The Senator is discussing the question of open diplomacy. Now, our declaration of war was open. It was discussed not universally—because we had not an opportunity to discuss it universally—but it was discussed openly. There was nothing secret about our declaration of war; it was not done in a corner; yet the people were not informed. In other words, I am trying to get at how the Senator's argument throws any light on the conclusion that we should not have secret diplomacy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator must go back further. He must inquire whether we would ever have been thrown into this war had it not been for the secret diplomacy in Europe. I was speaking of the fact that when war came both to Germany and to England and to this country these matters which might have been divulged and made known to them—the entente relationship, the treaties or understanding which bound those nations together, the obligation of one to another—had been in existence for years, and the people knew nothing whatever about them. They knew nothing about their relationship one to another, and had never been consulted with reference to those things for which they must now offer up their lives. Indeed, what I would impress upon you is the fact that these treaties are entered into contrary to the interests of the people, without the people being given any opportunity at all to pass upon them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I hesitate to interrupt the Senator, because I know he has a well-considered argument, and I do not want to disconcert him or divert him from any course he desires to pursue; but in relation to the inquiry submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, which occurred to me also, I do not quite see the connection between a rule of the Senate providing for the consideration of a treaty which has already been negotiated and is simply submitted to the Senate for its ratification and the evil the Senator complains of, which he denominates secret diplomacy, which, as I understand it, are the relations and negotiations which the plenipotentiaries of various nations have with each other before the treaty in form is submitted to the Senate for ratification.

Mr. BORAH. I differ entirely from the Senator. There is no binding treaty, of course, in this country until this body passes upon it, and all diplomacy ripens into binding obligations here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course. The Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. BORAH. The Executive department has announced its position in reference to open diplomacy; all the Senate need to do is to take care of its own business and see that its part, vital and essential, is in the open.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Executive has announced his notion about open diplomacy. It may bind him, and he may think he is not going to stop the war or make any peace until every other Government consents. All I want to call attention to is that in my judgment nine-tenths of whatever evil results from the methods which have prevailed among nations as to their diplomatic relations and the way they make treaties with each other proceeds from the secret negotiations, and a very small part of it proceeds from the fact that the treaty is not considered in public in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator is now speaking with reference to the nations of Europe where the treaty is concluded by the negotiators. They do not have to have any ratification by the Senate or by the parliamentary body. Of course, all we can do is to deal with our own affairs. But in this country that is not true. There is no binding relationship between this Government and any other until this body passes upon it; that is, in the way of a treaty. There is no treaty relationship, it makes no difference what negotiations have been had between the Secretary of State and other powers in Europe, until it is sent here to the representatives of the people and ratified; it is not binding upon our country. If we declare for an open session with reference to these treaties, the people will always be informed before their Nation is bound by the terms of the treaty and whether or not they desire to sustain it or to have its approval. Of course, we can have no effect upon the European situation except a moral effect. But our part of the work is an important part, and it is quite essential that it, above all others, be in the open, for if the consideration of the treaty is in the open it forces publicity on all previous matters.

I will say to the Senator, however, that the propaganda for open diplomacy in Europe is widespread and seems to extend to every country of Europe. The people are determined that they will never enter another war, if they can have their way about it, which they have not themselves had anything to do with originating, and with which they were not in sympathy when it starts, simply to carry out the agreement which had been made in secret by their representatives. In my humble judgment that applies also to the mass of the German people, if they are ever released from the grip of the dynastic power of the Hohenzollerns.

I want to say further that if we ever conclude a peace with the Hohenzollerns still in control of the diplomatic powers of Germany, enabled to make their secret agreements and their secret combinations with the other nations of Europe, this Republic will have to stand an armed camp until that condition is changed. Unless the public can know precisely what that dynasty is doing there will be no peace to this earth this side of their exile.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I go further than the Senator does, and I say even if those people do any thinking there will be no peace this side of exile.

Mr. BORAH. Possibly so; but why by our conduct here justify them in the use of their greatest weapon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean the people will exile them themselves.

Mr. BORAH. I trust the Senator is correct in regard to that, but if they had had their sessions and their arrangements and their negotiations in the open from the treaty of Frankfort on the Main in 1871 until this time we would not, in my judgment, have found the German people supporting the dynasty in this war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. We are in this war by reason of the fact that the German dynasty was able to make these secret arrangements and keep them from their own people. I read further from Mr. Villard's article:

> As we now know, the diplomacy of Germany and Austria not only shared the faults of the British but added to them the most conscienceless wickedness, including wholesale murder "without trace." It is hard to see how any country, after the war is over, can receive any German diplomats of the old school without watching them as one would common criminals and regarding them at all times with the utmost suspicion. They were not only ready to blow up factories, wreck railroads, and violate every conceivable law in neutral countries to which they were accredited, and therefore were on their honor to treat as guests treat hosts, but they were willing to embroil friendly nations on the mere chance of getting a slight advantage for Germany. Surely, if there ever was a case in which a profession has covered itself with disgrace and made out a complete case for its own destruction it is this profession of diplomacy. The light must be let into its every act hereafter.

Again, this author says:

> When the history of this whole period is written nothing will, of course, stand out more vividly and terribly than the secret diplomacy which led up to this war. I mean, of course, the decision taken by a foreign minister of Austria to send an ultimatum to Serbia which no self-respecting nation could have assented to. He won to his purpose an aged and decrepit monarch, then nearly on his deathbed, and, of course, he had the support of the ultra-militarist crowd. It was a beautiful chance, they thought, to make Serbia practically a vassal of Austria. No one, outside of newspaper offices, recalls to-day the name of that foreign minister or knows whether he is dead or alive, but he fired the train, and the unutterable misery that has resulted from it everyone knows, for the whole world has been drawn in; and no one can estimate the number of deaths which have directly and indirectly resulted therefrom. Some place them as high as 15,000,000 of men, women, and children.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator remember whether the Austrian Government declared war through the action of the Emperor or the ministry, or was the declaration of war made by the Austrian Parliament?

Mr. BORAH. I could not say as to that with certainty, but the Austrian Parliament acted in all those matters, of course, under the direction and dictation of the dynasty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not remember, but I was wondering whether it had any authority at all. Of course, the terms of the ultimatum delivered to Servia were made public; they were not secret. Their preparation for plotting toward that event of course was all in secret and was between Berlin and Vienna. I do not think that all the blame should rest upon the Austrians, but, however, the terms themselves were finally made public at the time they were delivered.

Mr. BORAH. The terms were made public as the ministry saw fit to make them public, but the Senator is familiar with the fact that even in the last 30 days the real facts for the first time have come out as to the actual conditions which prevailed, for instance, between England and Germany prior to the declaration of this war. The facts were never given to the German people; the facts were never given to the Austrian people. All they had was the statement of those men who were determined that the war should be brought about, and from their standpoint alone were the people permitted to judge of the necessity of war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no quarrel with the Senator in that statement of fact. I was endeavoring to fill the link, as it were, with my inquiry as to whether the Austrian Parliament ever had anything to do with the situation or was permitted to have anything to do with it.

Mr. BORAH. I am informed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who sits near me, that there was no declaration upon the part of the Parliament at all; that there was simply an ultimatum at the beginning of the movement of the troops.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The fact in Germany, as we know, is that the Reichstag has no power over the declaration of war. The Emperor may declare war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, referring to this paragraph again for a moment, as the writer says, the man who issued this ultimatum, who made the demand upon Serbia, and who finally "fired the train," has been lost sight of. I do not recall his name, and I do not know that anybody in the Senate Chamber could do so. But the fact remains that by reason of his power, given in secret ways, he was enabled to throw his country into war, and by reason of the secret understanding with the German authorities to bring them into the war and ultimately to bring the United States into the conflict. We had nothing whatever to do with the original causes of the war, was not interested at that time in the controversy, and was in no way responsible for anything which took place, but by reason of the power of these secret manipulators in Europe the train is fired which results in the conflict which is reaching around the world.

Now, shall we declare ourselves in favor of a policy which so far as we can go commits us absolutely as a Nation against any such system? Shall we, the Senate of the United States, say for its moral effect in Europe and for its binding effect in this country that the people shall be permitted to pass upon the negotiations which result in binding the Nation or in controversies between different nations with whom we may come into an understanding hereafter? Is not it acting on the side of reason, of justice, of peace to declare our position on this vital matter? It may be argued that we ourselves are not liable to suffer because of treaties made in secret; but let us not withhold our influence in advancing the cause throughout the world.

It is a simple question whether the Senate is willing to take the only step that it can take in encouragement of this movement. What will be the moral effect if we do not take it? What will be the construction put on our attitude throughout Europe if we refuse to take it? This body, which shares the power to make treaties, to conclude them, and without which no treaty can be made, should not go upon record in favor of concluding its treaties and obligations behind closed doors, not alone because of our interest in our own country but because of our interest in the people who will continue to suffer if we do not succeed in breaking down the system.

I said a moment ago our action can not bind and will not bind anyone but ourselves, but its moral effect throughout the world will be tremendous. The declaration of the President has had its effect throughout all Europe. It came from the President of a Republic which represents 110,000,000 free people. There is not a court in Europe nor a place where these questions are discussed but this declaration which I have read from the President has been discussed, and its influence and power for good can not be measured at this time, for no man knows to what extent it will carry forward this propaganda.

Let me refer to a debate which took place in Parliament a few days ago upon this matter.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator proceeds to discuss the debate to which he refers I want to see if I understand exactly the attitude of the Senator in regard to the effect of secret diplomacy upon the present war. As I understood him, if there had not been secret diplomacy perhaps there would not have been the present great world-wide conflagration. I am inclined to think that the Senator's premise, generally speaking, is correct, and I am somewhat in sympathy, if not in an entire accord, with his proposed amendment. But does not the Senator think that the cause of the present war results from the lust for power upon the part of Germany?

The Senator will recall that two years before the present war was launched upon the world Germany and Austria secretly approached the representative of Italy, Count Sonino, asking him to join with them under the treaty in launching an attack against the Slav forces with a view, of course, to enable Germany to force an entrance into Asia Minor. There is no question but that if Italy at that time had signified her willingness to support Germany and Austria the war would then have burst upon the world. Does not the Senator think that the cause of the war was not in secret diplomacy but rather the determination of Germany to subjugate the world and to force upon them her economic if not her political purposes?

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator as to the moving cause of the war, and the fact that this preparation had been going on for some time. I think ever since 1871. Ever since the close of the Turco-Prussian War the scheme has been going forward which finally resulted in this conflict, and back of it were the ambitions and the lust for power of which the Senator speaks. But this found its expression and its final achievement through the methods to which I have referred, the secret machinations and understandings and arrangements which they had been hatching and making throughout Europe.

I submit this question to the Senator: Does the Senator believe that those arrangements, those schemes, and plans, and machinations could have been carried on successfully as they were, to the final result in this war, had the negotiators and the movers not been protected by secrecy?

Mr. KING. Replying to the Senator I think I can answer that without qualification affirmatively. I believe if there had not been secret diplomatic relations and understandings between Germany and Austria Germany would not alone have precipitated this world war.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator and I are not in disagreement upon that proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And there was no possibility of the United States being involved in any such consideration, because any treaty when once ratified becomes public in this country. The chief vice of secret diplomacy in the Old World was keeping agreements secret so that they were not known and have not come to the knowledge of the people. Is not that a fact?

Mr. BORAH. Treaties are made public here after they are ratified, ordinarily; but may I ask the Senator from Nebraska what does it avail the people to get knowledge of the contract after it has been concluded and is binding upon them? Suppose we should make a treaty here and now with reference to Colombia and it would be distasteful entirely to the American people. After it was made and made public, what could they do about it? Suppose the treaty should be made in such terms that it would finally result in war with some South American country. Suppose we should write into the treaty with Colombia a clause which gave Colombia a particular advantage, a particular favor with reference to the Panama Canal, and after it was revealed the South American country should demand that it should be abrogated and the Congress should refuse to abrogate it, and they, by reason of that fact, should declare war, and we would call upon the American people to support it. They would support a contract if it was their Government's contract, although they might have been entirely opposed to it in the beginning.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FALL. There is exactly a clause such as the Senator has referred to in the pending treaty with Colombia.

Mr. KING. The Senator has in mind, doubtless, the Jay treaty, which was negotiated at an early date between our Nation and Great Britain. If that treaty had been submitted to the people, if they had known of the terms of that treaty, it would not have received the support of 25 per cent of the people of the United States. But after the treaty was negotiated we were bound by it, and our Nation was compelled to ratify its terms and to carry it into effect.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask the Senator from Utah a question? Might not that be true with a declaration of war?

Mr. KING. It would be very wrong for me to enter into a discussion in the time of the Senator from Idaho. I think that that same question was propounded by the distinguished Senator from Indiana to the Senator from Idaho a few moments ago, and I think his reply was very satisfactory, and I adopt it, with the permission of my friend, as my reply.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Idaho stated that at the time we entered this war in his judgment the people of the United States were not familiar with the causes of the war. Yet the representative body, Congress, may declare war. Now, the people were bound by that and accepted it. Why does not the same situation obtain with reference to a treaty? The people are not informed, as a rule, as to a treaty or as to the ratification of a treaty. The Senate ratifies a treaty and the people have to accept it.

Mr. BORAH. In the first place, as a matter of procedure, there is a vast difference between a treaty which comes in here and may be discussed from day to day in the open and is finally rejected and a declaration of war which comes in a great exigency when there is no alternative. The declaration of war generally results by reason of the diplomatic or treaty relations which have preceded it. If we are going to inform the people so that they may pass upon this matter, they ought to be informed with reference to those negotiations which lead up to the treaty.

Mr. WATSON. I think the Senator is entirely right, as far as his contention is concerned, as affecting European countries, but I do not believe his contention is equally valid as applied to the United States. If I had time——

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator be in favor of discussing a declaration of war in secret?

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. BORAH. Then why are you——

Mr. WATSON. On the other hand, I would not be in favor, if the Senator will permit me, of a vote by the people on a declaration of war.

Mr. BORAH. I am not asking at this time for a vote by the people on a declaration of war, because, in my judgment, it is not relevant to this discussion.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that the point the Senator is making is that the people must be informed. I am arguing that it is just as essential that the people be informed of a declaration of war that plunges us into war as that they shall be informed as to a treaty that shall be concluded as the result of the war.

Mr. BORAH. The people were informed in the sense in which the Senator is now speaking, because the President came before Congress and informed us of our position. It then went to the House and was there discussed and came here and was discussed. The only sense in which this country was not informed was the fact that the matter came with such precipitancy there was no opportunity for the people to discuss it among themselves, but, in so far as their agents acted openly, they were given all the information which they could possibly have, because everything was had in the open.

Now, it is entirely different with reference to treaties. We give them nothing, we do not state the reasons for the treaty, we do not state the contents of the treaty, we do not permit them to have any judgment in regard to the matter until it is binding, and the treaty may be the sole cause of the war.

Mr. WATSON. Yet did not the Senator state awhile ago, in answer to the first question I asked him, that in his judgment the American people were not informed?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, when I said that I had reference to the fact that prior to the time when we made our declaration and entered into the war the American people had not been advised of the necessity of war. Up to that time the feeling was that the war could be avoided, and the matter came at a time when there was no opportunity for delay in regard to it, and the people were not informed, except the information they got from the open declaration of the President, the press, and the open declaration and debates of Congress. Speaking for myself and not criticizing anyone, I think it most important when war seems possible that all facts possible should be made public. I utterly disapprove of the theory that the people can not be trusted to be wise and patriotic before war as I disapprove of the theory that they will not be wise and patriotic after war is declared.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, not only public sentiment but the attitude of the Government changed almost entirely after the sinking of the Lusitania. Before that time it was very doubtful whether Congress would have voted a declaration of war; but after we were attacked public sentiment changed, and the attitude of the Government, the representatives in Congress and the Executive department, changed completely.

Mr. WATSON. In that respect, is it not true that the attitude of the Government did not change after the sinking of the Lusitania, but that the attitude of the Government did not change until after the election?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I am not intruding, I hardly want to say that the attitude of the Government changed because of the election.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would hardly want to say that it changed after the election was safely passed. I think circumstances conspired to make our position a very responsible one in the world.

Mr. BORAH. Well, whatever the lack of information upon the part of the people was, it was due not to the fact that the Congress of the United States undertook to deal with the matter in secrecy, but it was due to the situation over which we had no control. Although at this time no one likes to remember it, every one would have liked to have kept out of this war if we could have done so with honor. That was the attitude of the American mind; that was the attitude of the American public; it was the attitude of the American Congress, and it was the attitude undoubtedly of the American President. When the time came which compelled a reversal of that policy it was a very short period from that time until we declared war, and in that respect I maintain, as I said awhile ago, the people were not sufficiently informed as to the necessity for the declaration of war until they got it from the President and Congress. It came almost contemporaneously with the declaration itself.

But you might just as well argue in favor of a secret declaration of war as to argue in favor of a secret consideration of a treaty which may result in war. In the debate which took place in the English Parliament a short time ago I read a paragraph from Mr. Trevelyan, who said—I call attention to this, Mr. President, to show that this discussion at this time is world-wide, and that the Congress of the United States can hardly take a backward step or refuse to take a forward step:

> At the same time the House of Commons has shown an appreciation that there is a new era approaching, and that the men and women of this country are going to take a more active and critical part in politics. * * * I am firmly convinced that during this war among many changes of opinion that have occurred there is, perhaps, no change of opinion so decisive as this, that our people now feel that self-government and democracy are unreal boasts, are empty phrases, if they are not applied with the same completeness to foreign policy as they are, and have been, to home policy.

There, Mr. President, in my judgment, is a succinct statement of the entire controversy. There can be no such thing as a democracy in the true sense of the word, as a rule of the people in any proper sense of the phrase if the matters which involve their foreign relationships are not as clearly understood and debated and considered by them as are the matters which deal with their domestic affairs. The matters which enter more directly into their very lives are the matters which are withheld from them; the matters concerning which they could endure secrecy are submitted to them; but when there is a controversy with a foreign power, which may involve much more than the amount of revenue which you are going to raise or the amount of tariff which you are going to impose it is withheld. Mr. Trevelyan says:

> During the early months of this war the Government then in office reversed the traditional policy of this country with regard to Constantinople. There may or may not have been good reasons for altering that policy. It was done without the knowledge of Parliament and without the knowledge of the country. The Government pledged this country to secure Constantinople for the Czar as a prize of war.

There is one of the late examples of secret diplomacy. Right here in the very midst of this war, fought for democracy and for the rights of the people, two great nations enter into an understanding that they will sacrifice money and life for a territorial advantage, and the whole thing is withheld from those who are called to the battle field to die. The great cause of liberty, of civilization, is pulled down by secret diplomacy to the dead level of a real estate deal.

With whom was the negotiation made? It was made between the powers of England and the Czar of Russia—the representative of the bureaucracy of Russia. And by whom was the Czar of Russia controlled? The Czar of Russia was controlled by the ignorant, unlettered, lascivious impostor, Rasputin. Late developments indicate that the negotiations with foreign powers were shaped largely by this depraved and repulsive creature, who had taken possession of the Court of Russia, and behind closed doors played with the lives and fortunes of the Russian people and the people of Europe generally like pawns upon a chessboard.

Shall the Senate of the United States put its seal of approval upon such transactions by saying that we, too, will bind our people if it is within our power to do it, and notify them after the contract has been made? As this member of Parliament very well says, there is no such thing as democracy; it is a false phrase, unless the people are permitted to pass upon that for which they may be called upon to suffer and to die. He continues:

For 18 months they refused to give the House of Commons any information. At the conclusion of that time the arrangement was revealed to the world by the then Russian premier. Shortly afterwards occurred the Russian revolution. It then became apparent that the Russian people did not approve of the policy at all, but that it had been done in their name by the unscrupulous ministers who surrounded the Czar during his régime. I do not know why that arrangement with Russia about Constantinople should have been concealed from this house and the country for any reason except fear of their disapproval, and I am personally convinced—I may be wrong—that if there had been a foreign affairs committee, before whom the principal acts of policy had to be placed before they were realized, that agreement, in fact, would never have been arrived at with Russia.

So, Mr. President, we see that the discussion is going on elsewhere; the movement is going forward in other countries, and we are simply keeping pace by our declaration in regard to this with that movement, which is world-wide. Its evils are upon every hand. There is not a boy leaving his country home under the American flag and going forward now to offer all he has upon the battle fields of Europe who is not to a very great extent a victim of secret diplomacy.

The conspiring ministers of Europe brought about a condition of affairs which compelled the United States to fight or give up its liberty, because the scheme behind closed doors was to destroy human liberty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator cite any treaty being to any extent the cause of the present war, which was not a treaty kept in secret after it was made?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me answer that in this way—I have answered the same suggestion before—that to my mind to keep a treaty secret until it is made binding, and then to reveal it is not to protect the people at all, because after it has become the binding contract of their Government, whether it is satisfactory to them or not, the people have no opportunity at all to deal with it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is it not a fact, and is it not a part of American history, that treaties which have become unsatisfactory to the American people and to public opinion have been denounced and set aside?

Mr. BORAH. Some have after long delays and discussions; that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The very fact that such a treaty was published and known to the people, and that they have got public opinion to control the Senate——

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator speaks with reference to all treaties which have been made by the United States, I do not agree with that at all. That has been true with reference to some treaties. For instance, the treaty with Russia was annulled or set aside, because it became very unsatisfactory to the large portion of our people, who are growing now more powerful all the time, and just prior to the election of 1912 both parties declared in favor of annulling it. But if a people are fit to pass upon a treaty after it is made and cause it to be annulled, they are equally capable of passing upon it while it is being made, and the latter course may often save friction and misunderstandings. It is a serious question to annul a treaty once made, and a wise government will not pursue a course which drives a people to that extraordinary and dangerous course.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Is it not true, in the Senator's opinion, that the very fact that the people of the United States, through their Congress, denounced the treaty with Russia is to a very great extent the cause of the ill feeling existing on the part of the Russian people against the people of the United States to-day?

Mr. BORAH. I have heard that statement made by those who claim that such is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Idaho would draw some distinction between the method by which secret treaties are made in Europe, and which produce wars in Europe, and the process by which treaties are made in the United States by the President and submitted to the Senate for ratification—a process which does not exist in the countries of Europe. There treaties are made by the monarch and ratified by him and submitted to no one else for ratification.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, it does not make a particle of difference, so far as the question of secrecy is concerned, whether there are two parties engaged in a treaty or one party, if in both cases the proceedings are secret. If the President of the United States must come to the Senate of the United States for his ratification, and the Senate of the United States remains a secret power, it does not make any difference whether the treaty is made by one or by two secret powers when they have both kept the secret.

It is true that the powers in Europe make their treaties without the ratification of Parliament; but if the Parliament of the United States, or the Senate of the United States, participates as a secret body with reference to that matter, what difference does it make whether the treaty is made by one or by two powers?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator's position is that it is not possible to trust the Senate of the United States, representing every State in the Union and bound immediately to publish the treaty when ratified; and he treats that ratification as similar to a ratification by a ministry of the King, when that ministry can consider the treaty is a secret document. It seems to me there is a vast distinction between the two.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I really do not think, with all my respect for the Senate of the United States, that, if it were a secret body on all public questions it would not be many generations before it would be as corrupt as all other secret bodies come in time to be. Every secret governmental agency tends to become irresponsible, selfish, and corrupt, and while we are Americans we are human. While I am perfectly willing to concede all my countrymen will ask, and that is that they are a peculiarly virtuous people, in all the ancient meaning of that word, yet I believe, nevertheless, they could not withstand the influence which finally corrupts and controls a secretly controlled legislative body. The Congress of the United States would become just as corrupt and just as venal in course of time, if it were a secret body, as the other secret bodies of the world have which have followed the same course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator once more. The ministry of the king is selected by the king himself. The Senate of the United States is an elective body, chosen by the people to represent them in the making of treaties, which is one of its constitutional powers. The Senate possesses the power at any time to consider treaties in the open, and on a number of occasions since the Senator from Idaho has been here and since I have been here it has taken that course. Why, under these circumstances, bind the Senate to a rule that it must consider all treaties in the open, when it now has the power to consider them in the open?

Mr. BORAH. It is true that ministers represent the king, and there are no secrets supposedly between the ministers and the king. We represent the people, and there should be no secrets between us and those whom we represent. We are here in a representative capacity; we are not ambassadors from the different States; we are the representatives of the people. Upon what possible theory can the Senator from Nebraska argue that there should be complete secrecy between him and the man whom he represents and whose agent he is? The people pay the taxes; they fight the battles; they bear the burdens, and upon what theory can we withhold from them these matters which are of prime concern to them? Is it because they are not sufficiently intelligent to comprehend them? Is it because they have not the capacity to deal with them? Will the Senate of the United States take the position that the American people have not the intelligence to pass upon those matters which involve life and death to their country? Upon what theory do we withhold the facts? We are their representatives, their agents, and nothing more.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion there, I have not considered that the reason the Senate had a rule which provided for the consideration of treaties with foreign nations in secret session was because the Senate distrusted those who elected them, or because Senators thought they were anything but representatives of the people, but it was because the relations of different foreign countries to each other are frequently involved in the discussion of a treaty that we are to ratify with one of them, and that, with the delicate situations existing between foreign sovereignties, for all of those things to be dragged into the open on the floor of the United States Senate and discussed might do damage in certain directions both to our interests and to our friends abroad, which might be avoided if they were discussed behind closed doors. It never entered my head that in voting to consider a proposed treaty with a foreign nation behind closed doors we were doing it because we thought the American people were unfit to know what we were about. I may be mistaken about that, but the Senator asked upon what theory closed doors should be advocated, and that is the theory that I had supposed to exist.

Mr. BORAH. What are these delicate questions which may offend foreign powers? These delicate questions are too often questions of dubious righteousness.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, all the delicate questions that exist between different Governments of Europe and Asia and Africa, whatever they may be, and however secret they may be, would be laid open to the interpretations and remarks of the several Senators upon this floor. We have tried one way, and we know how much of a success or a failure this country has made. We have not tried the other way. The present rule has existed in the Senate since the foundation of this Government, which was quite as much a representative Government then as now, and the early Senators were men who had helped make the Government and who had helped form the Constitution. I do not know upon what theory that rule of the Senate was ever adopted, if not upon the one which I have suggested.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks of "delicate questions." I take it that they are such questions that if they were thrown open to the public, the public might say or do something which would offend some power in Europe. Not if the powers of Europe desire peace and honorable relationships.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all; that is not my theory about it. My theory about it is this, Mr. President: There has been in Europe for many years a doctrine known as maintaining the balance of power, and we know the jealousies that have existed and the wars that have prevailed in Europe. We have not known, as the Senator from Idaho so well says, they having practiced secret diplomacy there for centuries, the real relation of those nations to each other. We might not know them even if the Senate adopted a rule to debate in the open such treaties as may be proposed. But those are the delicate questions to which I refer. Of course I can not make a catalogue of them; it would be longer than a catalogue of the ships in Homer; but they are questions growing out of the rivalries, historic prejudices, and aspirations of rival powers of Europe. That is the only way I can describe them in general terms.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that if the so-called "delicate questions" had been made public in Europe this war would have been prevented before it ever had an opportunity to begin, and that the "delicate questions" which arose when the Bolsheviki foreign minister published the agreements between the entente allies were highly disconcerting because they ought not to have been made and because they proposed to hand about sovereignties without consulting the people who were involved. Those are some "delicate questions" that ought to be made public both for our sake, for the sake of the allies, and for the sake of the civilization of this earth.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there may be "delicate questions" in Europe in connection with which secrecy should prevail. I am rather inclined to think that in the European chancelleries, where so many treaties are made for purely personal reasons or because of personal ambitions and at the instigation of a class of people who are sometimes interested, that that might be true; but I am speaking now, Mr. President, with reference to treaties which shall be made by this Republic. As to them, there can be no "delicate questions" as it occurs to me. I can not think now of any question that has arisen with reference to any treaty of this country since the beginning of the Government which could be really considered a question which the people ought not to know about. These "delicate questions" are rather indelicate suggestions to the effect that foreign affairs are too high up in the scale of intellectual effort for the consideration of the people. All public questions were once too delicate for the people, and in some countries of Europe, particularly in Germany, it is still so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would agree entirely with the Senator if open discussion did not also involve letting the people of every other country in the world know all about it.

Mr. BORAH. What question has arisen with reference to any treaty in which the United States has been interested since the Jay treaty up to the present time that it would not have been well for the people of all Europe to have known about? Look back over the history of our treaties, their negotiation, their terms, and what finally became of them, and what question has arisen with reference to these treaties in the last hundred and odd years which the whole world could not have known about and been better off if they had known about it, and what question has arisen upon which the American people could not have passed with intelligence?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to make a suggestion with reference to a statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. He has said that it is possible now for the Senate of the United States to consider a treaty in open session, and that he has known that practice to be followed. The proposition involved here is simply that we should make that the general rule; and then, if in any particular instance a treaty should be considered in secret session, by a vote of the Senate that course can be adopted and pursued.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. By a four-fifths vote.

Mr. FALL. As it stands now; but the Senate can change the four-fifths requirement to a majority vote if it chooses to do so. It can change its rules by a majority vote.

Mr. President, this resolution simply proposes to adopt as a general rule the open consideration of treaties and leave their secret consideration as the exception; in other words, if the rule suggested by the Senator from Idaho is adopted, we would proceed to consider treaties generally in open session, but it would remain for the Senate, as it can control its own action at any time it pleases, to adopt its own method of consideration, and it could treat any subject in secret if it so desired.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. Lord Rosebery, speaking in Glasgow a short time ago, used this language:

> Armaments must depend upon your policy, and it is extremely difficult for us, who have nothing about foreign policy but what we see in the newspapers, to form any accurate judgment as to what that foreign policy may be. Do not think that in saying this I am disparaging the knowledge of foreign policy which is derived from newspapers. I am only saying this, which must be familiar to all who have any knowledge of the subject, that what is seen on the stage of foreign policy is but a small part of the whole, by far the greater portion of which takes place behind the scenes, and as we are ordinary mortals we are not admitted behind the scenes, not even to the door of the green room, our knowledge of foreign policy must be based mainly on speculation. * * * I do not know if any Glasgow merchant here would care particularly to do what we do in foreign affairs—that is, to engage in vast and unknown liabilities and affix his signature to them without knowing their nature and extent.

Coming from one who has been prominent in the official life of England, it seems to me this must be regarded as a rather remarkable statement. It discloses that this movement for open diplomacy is not confined alone to those who have been without experience, but that it has taken hold of the minds of those who have had vast experience with reference to these matters and who know from their own actual contact with them what the evils are.

Mr. Chamberlain, another prominent English official at one time, said:

> I sometimes ask myself whether in the future it will not be necessary, and, indeed, if it will not be a good thing that the foreign secretary should take the House of Commons, in the first instance, and his countrymen at large in the second, much more into his confidence than he has done in the past. We have passed in recent years through European crises, the full gravity of which was not realized by our people, if realized at all, until after they had passed into history. I ask myself, can you conduct democratic governments on these principles?

Mr. Trevelyan, after quoting from these authorities, says:

> While during the last few years the flood of democracy has been rising—whether one likes it or whether one does not—and the great departments of state have become more and more under the control of this house, the foreign office has remained high and dry in its old attitude, quite apart from this general rise in the tendency of democratic control.

Let us hope the Senate of the United States will not take that position; but that, while this movement is going forward we, as the representatives of one of the great free nations of the earth, will at least keep pace with it, and that, in so far as it is under our control, we will keep in harmony with the movement.

Mr. Trevelyan further says, having reference to the matter to which the Senator from Nebraska has adverted, namely, as to whether or not there may be some details that ought not to be revealed:

> We want to know the broad lines of policy. We want to know what our relations are with foreign countries in the main, the basis and foundation of them. * * * We also want information with regard to the course of events. What happens now? We, as Lord Rosebery said, have to rely on the press. What happens in the press? We see a series of events reported with great fullness; we begin to read of them. The next day the story continues, and we read it with interest; but the day after that some domestic concern crops up, either in Parliament or in the country, and the foreign news is withdrawn, the story stops, the country is under the impression that that particular issue is over. It may not be at all, and we who are precisely on the same footing as any individual, as the man in the street—because we know no more than they do with regard to foreign affairs—are also prevented from following the course of events.
> Anybody who looks over the history of the last hundred years or so is very much struck by the constant change in the combinations between the nations of Europe. The friend of one decade becomes the foe of the next, and that continual change is due to the fact that these alliances, instead of being based on the sound approval of the people, are based on bargains made by individual ministers of Governments, and, so long as they rest on that basis, they can only be ephemeral.

The people will not be so capricious, because the people are there all the time. Ministers drop out, governments depart, but the people are there all the time; and if you get their consent and approval and backing to agreements and alliances, made openly and clearly in the light of the day, you are much more likely to get duration and to prevent what has been the spectacle of Europe in the last century—all these continual changes of combinations in what is treated really as a diplomatic game.

* * * * * * *

Again I say what I have said already of alliances and agreements: Unless you get the sanction of the people behind treaties—if treaties are simply documents to which only the Executive, only the foreign secretary, or the foreign office affix their signatures—you will never get the proper respect paid to them which we hope to see paid in the future.

Mr. President, Mr. Balfour replied to this argument, and doing so used this language:

Both these two honorable gentlemen spend a great deal of time upon what are now becoming the familiar platitudes of democracy versus secret diplomacy.

Sarcasm, Mr. President, is a familiar and an honorable, intellectual weapon. It is ordinarily used, however, in the defense of stale and worn-out institutions. That which the conscience can not well support the intellect will sometimes slavishly defend, and when it does, it generally indulges in taunt and sarcasm, because it is an easy method by which to "get by," and it is generally quite pleasing to the speaker himself. But, speaking of "platitudes," this cultured and distinguished reactionary belongs to the school of English politics who at one time looked upon the whole scheme of this Republic as a "platitude."

Further, he says of one of the speakers to whom he was replying:

He drew with considerable elaboration the well-known caricature of foreign ministers spinning diplomatic webs, oblivious, apparently, of the public opinion of the respective countries, and pursuing all those worn-out methods with the result that civilized mankind is now groaning under a series of undemocratic treaties. The picture is entirely fantastic.

When Mr. Balfour made this statement he was just fresh from the making of a treaty with Russia with reference to Constantinople, and just fresh from the making of the other treaties which were exposed at Petrograd. He says to the people of the world that this theory that ministers act in secrecy, spinning webs which obligate and burden their people, is purely fantastic; and yet there had been woven around the English and the allied people by this same secret diplomacy, under the manipulating power of foreign diplomats, at the same time that he was speaking, those secret treaties which have been exposed at Petrograd.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I hope the Senator will point out that those secret treaties were guilty of the very charge made against the Teutonic dynasty of proposing annexations, and they had the effect—the evil effect, the fatal effect—of completely demoralizing the faith and confidence of the Russian people in the integrity of the allies.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt at all but that the treaties that were made and afterwards exposed had a powerful effect in breaking down the confidence of the Russian people in the allies. I think the Senator is correct in that statement. Everything indicates that when those treaties were made known the Russian people became distrustful of the entire allied combination.

Mr. President, when this conflict shall have closed—no one can foretell that happy day—but when war shall cease and a scourged and weary people begin to assume again the avocations and duties of peace, some of the most vital of human problems will come up for consideration—problems whose solution will take form in treaties to be ratified by this body. There will be first the peace treaty, upon which we are to build our hopes for permanent security, for a durable peace. It will have to do with our welfare and happiness as a people, our life as a Nation for years and perhaps for centuries. Certainly no one will contend that that treaty or any part of the negotiations should be considered in secret. Certainly no one will contend that those who have fought the fight and made the sacrifice, who in future years are to bend under the fearful debt the war will impose, and finally through their energy and deprivations pay it, will not be entitled to know every step from the first to the consummation. Certainly no man will stand in the Senate and invoke secrecy upon that scene made possible by the blood and the offerings of the people. Certainly no one will contend that there are "delicate matters" here, too delicate for the inspection and approval or disapproval of those who are to make the treaty possible. Will this body dare to put its seal of approval upon any treaty not considered and discussed in the open and before all whose efforts have made it possible to have a treaty. It would be a rank and cowardly insult to the dead, a shameful betrayal of the living.

Along with the treaty of peace will come other propositions, propositions which will reach down and take hold upon the very foundations of our national being and, if certain courses are adopted, may change the whole drift of our national life. We will likely be called upon then as a people, as a Nation, to pass upon the question of whether we will depart from the advice of the Father of his Country to enter into no permanent alliance with European powers or whether we shall hold fast to the faith which has guided us through the first century. I am not going to discuss the merits of this question now; my views, for what they are worth, are known to my colleagues here, and the vicissitudes of war have not changed them. But certainly that policy which bears the stamp of approval of Washington and Jefferson, which enabled us to steer through the unexplored sea upon which we launched our frail bark in 1789, and without which, in my judgment, the story of this Republic would have been a short-lived one, will not be changed behind closed doors. Whether we shall abandon the policy or hold to it is a subject upon which honest and patriotic men may differ, but any man who would advocate its change without the full and complete knowledge and approval of the American people would have no claim to the respect and confidence of those who love free governments. Not one step should be taken, not the slightest obligation binding as to such a course should be had without the full knowledge and the unqualified approval of the people whose government this is. That which uproots the sacred traditions of a people should be approved alone by the people. No closed doors on that transaction.

Another phase of the same subject is presented in the proposition of a league to enforce peace—a league which it is hoped all nations will join. Neither do I discuss the merits of this proposition at this time.

I only point out its tremendous import, its almost stupendous possibilities for change in our national life. Some think it would make for peace, some think it would turn this Republic into an armed camp. It seems to me clear enough the changes wrought by such a course will be such as to make us a different political structure. We will necessarily take upon ourselves the race questions, the political jealousies, the troubles of tortured Europe. Some think we would be able to compose them and make for permanent peace. Others think, and with them stands the judgment of the fathers, that it would only draw us into the maelstrom of European politics. Only experience can fathom the troubled waters of that boundless sea. Will this, too, be considered in secret? Will alliances and treaties be made and confirmed for such a momentous course in secret? Will those matters upon which hang the happiness of the living and the countless generations to come be disposed of as "delicate problems"—too delicate for the people to understand or to pass upon, but not too delicate, perchance, to require limb and life in their support?

Mr. President, in the face of the superb courage, the sublime and willing sacrifice of the people in behalf of this civilization of ours, in the presence of this fearful catastrophe from whose destruction if we are to be saved at all we are to be saved by the people—the man in the street, in the factory, on the farm, in the professions—will men still contend that these same people are not entitled to know every act and deed of their public servants to the end that their sanity, their love of peace, their sense of justice, may help to clarify and make wholesome the relations which nations are henceforth to bear toward one another? People who suffer and die as our people are doing in the great cause of civilization can be trusted in every hour of every emergency which is to mark, as we hope, the onward progress of this Republic.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he expects to get a vote upon this resolution this evening?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not expect to press the resolution to a vote this evening. I understand that possibly the Senator from New Mexico desires to speak before adjournment.

Mr. FALL. I should like to occupy a little time.

Mr. OWEN. If that be the case, I want to submit for a few minutes some observations upon a bill (S. 4671) which I introduced this morning relative to child labor. It will take only a few minutes for me to say what I wish to say.

Mr. President, I have just submitted to the Senate a bill to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor.

This is the same bill which was passed on September 1, 1916, whose constitutionality was denied by five members of the Supreme Court of the United States on Monday last, except that I have inserted two amendments—one an amendment to section 2, as follows:

Said board may permit exceptions under the rules imposed by this act for a limited period of time, not exceeding 12 months, to be made a matter of record in the office of the board.

I add a new section 7, as follows:

The constitutionality of this act having been declared by the competent authority of Congress and of the President of the United States at the time of its passage shall only be questioned thereafter by the Congress itself and the people of the United States in their sovereign capacity as voters. Any executive or judicial officer who in his official capacity denies the constitutionality of this act shall ipso facto vacate his office. No judge of an inferior Federal court shall permit the question of the constitutionality of this act to be raised in the court over which he presides, and the United States Supreme Court shall have no appellate power to pass upon such question.

Mr. President, the act of September 1, 1916, passed by Congress for the purpose of abating the exploitation of the child labor of America for money-making purposes has been declared unconstitutional by a divided court, as follows: Chief Justice White, Justice McReynolds, Justice Van Devanter, Justice Pitney, and Justice Day holding it unconstitutional, and Justice McKenna, Justice Holmes, Justice Brandeis, and Justice Clark holding it constitutional. If any one of the first five had been absent from his post on account of sickness the act would have been held constitutional.

If any one of the five had agreed with the opinion of the other four in regard to whether or not it was constitutional, it would have been construed as constitutional; that is to say, it would have been held constitutional by the opinion of this honorable court in the particular case pending before them. This decision does not prevent the court from amending its opinion and declaring the act constitutional in other cases. It does not prevent Congress from authorizing two more members to be appointed on the Supreme Court who entertain the same view as the minority, and reversing the court in the next case that comes before the court, as was done in the Legal Tender cases. I did not regard that as an orderly or a very advisable procedure. But it was done as a matter of necessity, under a national exigency to protect the national exigency.

Mr. KING. Or a moral course.

Mr. OWEN. I do not care at this time to review the reasons which led the people of the United States, through their Representatives in Congress, to declare the principle of public policy that child labor should not be exploited for money-making purposes as far as interstate commerce is concerned.

But the public policy was declared by Congress, and now the policy of the people of the United States, acting through the legislative branch, has been nullified, set aside, held for naught by the action, in effect, of a single individual judge necessary to make a majority of this honorable court.

One man has nullified the opinion, the matured public opinion, of the country, as expressed by Congress, and has overruled both Houses of Congress and the President of the United States and four members of the Supreme Court, and has established as a judicial decree that every Member of the Senate and every Member of the House voting for the act and the President of the United States violated the Constitution of the United States, which they severally lifted up their hands before Almighty God and swore to observe.

This act of the Supreme Court is not intended as a personal affront to the Members of the House, to the Senators, and to the President of the United States approving the act by charging that they have severally violated the Constitution of the United States. These learned justices who have declared this act of Congress unconstitutional have merely followed the unwarranted, the unjust, and unsound precedent set by John Marshall in the petty case of Marbury against Madison, when he had the temerity to exercise the veto over Congress as the first judge on the bench to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. John Marshall's decision was absolutely wrong and contrary to the history and spirit of the law, and was a piece of judicial usurpation which was not followed by the Supreme Court of the United States in a single case for 50 years until the fatal case of Dred Scott, when that honorable Supreme Court declared slavery a constitutional national right and the Missouri Compromise as unconstitutional, void, and of no effect.

The deadly consequences which followed that unwise decision had to be remedied on the field of battle by the armed forces of the majority in four years of blood and tears of the American people, because that decision immediately raised the moral question of slavery to such a burning issue that there appeared no adjustment possible by the slaveholding States except by a dissolution of the Union—a policy too full of danger for America to be permitted, and America chose the lesser alternative of civil war and the rewriting of the Constitution, declaring the Republic a Nation and that slavery should not be permitted within its borders, either as a constitutional right or any other kind of right. The Nation agreed with Abraham Lincoln, in defiance of the Supreme Court decision, when Abraham Lincoln said:

If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong.

Mr. President, slavery is wrong.

The slavery of children is wrong, and the child-labor act was intended to prevent the slavery of children, even by their own parents, in so far as the United States could prevent it by the exercise of its control over interstate commerce.

This act did not intend to interfere with the exploitation of children inside of State lines. The correction of that abuse was left to the States, but in some States the cotton manufacturers and other like forces were sufficiently powerful politically to be able by their joint influence to prevent any interference with intrastate exploitation of children. The Congress under the influence of the public sentiment of the people of the United States passed this act to prevent the products of exploited child labor crossing a State line, and in this way it was intended to safeguard American youth as far as Congress had recognized power.

The Supreme Court in rendering its decision has in effect declared that in the opinion of a majority of this honorable court every Congressman and every Senator and the President, in passing the child-labor act, violated the Constitution. This is merely a judicial opinion within the conceived discretion of each judge who delivers the opinion. The opinion is not intended to be disrespectful to Congress; it merely proceeds upon the assumption that the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States and the President of the United States have not the intelligence to determine whether this law is constitutional or not, and have erred in holding it constitutional. Either this, or that the House of Representatives, the Senate of the United States, and the President of the United States, knowing the law was unconstitutional, passed it in willful defiance of their oaths of office. I do not assume the latter theory possible.

It is easy to understand that a justice who regards John Marshall's decision as a sound precedent would say to himself, as John Marshall did, in effect, I am confronted with the solemn duty of saying whether this law shall stand against the superior law of the Constitution.

John Marshall argued that the Constitution was the supreme law of the land under Article VI, which declares:

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

But John Marshall, in passing upon the law which Congress said on its oath had been passed in pursuance of the Constitution, held that it was not passed in pursuance thereof, and that therefore he was charged with the solemn duty of exercising a veto over the legislative powers of the people of the United States under the form of his judicial discretion.

And so this mischievous, dangerous, unconstitutional precedent has come down to this day.

Mr. President, I do not in any degree question the sincerity, the integrity of mind, or the patriotic purpose of any of the honorable learned justices who rendered this opinion in the child-labor act. I do not believe they intended to be discourteous to Congress, but I charge them with having nullified, as far as the particular case before them permitted them to do, a great human public policy of the United States duly recorded by the House of Representatives, by the Senate of the United States, and by the President of the United States in the child-labor act, and approved by widespread public opinion.

And I say that this honorable court should not be permitted by Congress to determine the policy of the people of the United States, since this is the duty of Congress alone, and Congress has full constitutional power and the moral duty to prevent it. (Art. III, sec. 2, Constitution, U. S.)

Mr. President, every lawyer, almost without exception, will loyally stand by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as the last word in human wisdom. It must be remembered, however, that every lawyer is an inchoate judge and instinctively approves added power to the courts. He instinctively and loyally supports the courts by whose approval he lives and thrives and has his being, but not one lawyer out of a hundred is aware of the fact that the only opportunity which the Supreme Court has of conflicting with Congress concerning the constitutionality of an act is through the unwise exercise of the very appellate powers granted by Congress. Thus the occasion arises in the Supreme Court which puts upon a conscientious judge of the Marshall school of thought the "solemn duty," which I am sure few judges would desire, of declaring unconstitutional an act which the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States and the President of the United States had on their oaths of office declared constitutional, provided the judge personally thought the act unconstitutional. The obvious remedy for this possible conflict between the court and Congress is to take from the court the right to consider the question of the constitutionality of an act after Congress had determined the act was constitutional in the manner the Constitution provides (Art. III, sec. 2). A wise judge, I think, would be quite justified, under existing statutes, in declaring that the Representatives of the people of the United States in Congress having declared an act constitutional, the conclusive presumption arises that the act is constitutional, that matter having been settled by competent authority, but since some judges have not had the wisdom to do this it remains for Congress to remove from such judges the embarrassing situation in which such judges find themselves when confronted with the conception of their own interpretation of the Constitution on the one side as against the interpretation of the Constitution by Congress and by the President and by the Attorney General on the other side.

It is said by some that the judges are much more learned and wiser than Congress in construing the Constitution. I can not concede this whimsical notion. They are not more learned; they are not wiser; they are not more patriotic; and what is the fatal weakness if they make their mistakes there is no adequate means of correcting their judicial errors, while if Congress should err the people have an immediate redress; they can change the House of Representatives almost immediately and can change two-thirds of the Senate within four years, while the judges are appointed for life and are removable only by impeachment.

No one would approve impeachment for a judicial error honestly made; and this great and honorable court, which we all revere, will never have its integrity or its patriotism challenged.

Mr. President, the supreme powers of the people of the United States are vested in Congress and in the President as the executive of the laws passed by Congress and the President. The Supreme Court, authorized by the Constitution to construe the meaning of the legislative will as crystallized in the statutes, was established by Congress, the number of its members fixed by Congress, their salaries fixed by Congress, their marshal, their clerk, their office force, their library, their assembly room, the means by which to enforce their decrees, all furnished by statute, and Congress granted all of the jurisdiction which the Supreme Court enjoys, except cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls and those in which a State shall be a party. Under the original constitutional jurisdiction of the Supreme Court the number of cases are negligible, and therefore of no great public consequence—about 20 cases in 130 years; but the Constitution provides with regard to all other cases that—

> The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make. (Art. III, sec. 2, Const.)

The Supreme Court has maintained this interpretation of the Constitution in the following cases:

Wiscart v. Dauchey, 3 Dall., 321 (1796); Durousseau v. U. S., 6 Cranch., 307 (1810); U. S. v. Gordon, 7 Cranch., 287 (1813); Daniels v. C., R. I. & P. R. R., 3 Wall., 250 (1865); In re McCardle, 7 Wall., 510 (1868); Nat. Ex. Bank v. Peters, 144 U. S., 570 (1891); Colo. C. C. M. Co. v. Turck, 150 U. S., 138 (1893).

In quite a famous case, known as the McCardle case, in 1868 Congress withdrew from the Supreme Court the power to pass upon the case after the case had been docketed and exercised the right and the power of Congress to make an exception in the McCardle case; Congress was quite right in doing this, and the Supreme Court did not express an opinion in the case—Seventh Wallace, 510—but solemnly upheld the exception which Congress chose to make under section 2, Article III, of the Constitution of the United States.

I now propose that Congress shall make an exception of the child-labor act under this constitutional authority and withdraw from the Supreme Court the power to express an opinion upon the constitutionality of that act or to contradict Congress and put it in contempt before the people of the United States. If Congress does not take this step, then Congress turns over to the Supreme Court the final right to declare the policy of the Government of the people of the United States and to exercise the power of veto over Congress and the President—a power never contemplated by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, no civilized nation permits the judiciary to set aside its laws on the ground that they are not constitutional, except perhaps that the United States has, by an oversight, apparently yielded to it in a few cases.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the highest court in England within the last two years set aside the law of Canada because it was in violation of the constitution of Canada or the enabling act of Canada.

Mr. KING. I was going to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Australia has done precisely what the Senator from Minnesota says Great Britain has done; and the appellate court of Australia has cited in support of its construction of its powers the action of the Supreme Court of the United States in the famous McCulloch case, to which the Senator referred.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I would be glad if the Senator would put the citation in the RECORD. I do not recall the instance referred to in the case of Canada. Of course, however, Canada is merely a subordinate State, a dominion, subject to the supreme power of Great Britain, and must be bound by the terms of its admission as a part of the Empire.

Neither Great Britain, France, Italy, Austria, Germany, Belgium, Denmark, Australia, nor New Zealand permits judges to set aside the laws of their highest legislative authority.

Mr. President, one of the unsound, mischievous teachings of lawyers has been that Congress and the Supreme Court are coordinate, cocqual branches of the Government, with the power to "protect" the people against Congress. The people can protect themselves against Congress at the polls, and they do it if Congress errs.

The supreme legislative power of the American people is in Congress.

The supreme executive power is in the hands of the President.

The "Supreme" Court has an original jurisdiction under the Constitution, under which has arisen about 20 cases in 130 years of no national importance. All of the jurisdiction which they have has been given them by Congress in appellate jurisdiction by statute law, and can be taken away, because all of their authority is appellate and statutory, SUBJECT TO SUCH EXCEPTIONS as Congress may provide.

Mr. President, the sovereignty of the United States is vested in the people, and in 48 State constitutions this principle is solemnly declared.

The people control Congress, and if Congress errs the people can correct Congress either by admonition or by removal from office.

The people of the 48 States control the State judiciary and are not controlled by the judiciary.

Forty-eight States have two ways of removing judges—either by impeachment, by a short tenure of office, or by resolution of the legislature. Thirty-two States have three ways of removing judges. Thirty-two States may remove judges by resolution of the State legislature. Seven States have four ways of removing judges, to wit, impeachment, legislative recall, short tenure of office, and popular recall.

At the Constitutional Convention at which the Constitution of the United States was framed three times an attempt was made to give the Supreme Court some sort of very limited authority of expressing opinions about the validity of acts of Congress; it never received over 2 votes; and out of the 65 members of the Constitutional Convention only 11 members favored giving the judiciary any kind of even a limited power in this regard. These were Blair, Gerry, Hamilton, King, Mason, Morris, Williamson, Baldwin, Wilson, Brearly, and Livingston.

I undertook to show on January 27, 1917, that every case in which the Supreme Court declared an act of Congress unconstitutional, where the case had any importance, the court was wrong, with a single exception.

The plain truth is, Mr. President, that judges on the bench, like Senators, do not cease to be human beings, influenced by previous associations, training, environment, and surrounding opinions.

And if you want a conservative decision, by all means get a majority of the court appointed as conservatives. If you want a home-rule decision, get a court composed of Irishmen.

This does not question the good faith of men.

Catholics devoutly believe in transsubstantiation. Protestants disbelieve it. We must not question the sincerity of men merely because they differ in opinion with us, but when it comes to deciding the national policy this must be left to Congress and Congress must exercise its power, and in granting the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction Congress must make such exceptions and such regulations as will prevent the Supreme Court inadvertently assuming to direct the Nation's policies.

This can be done under the Constitution in the manner which I have proposed, by forbidding the judges of inferior Federal courts questioning the constitutionality of an act when Congress has declared it constitutional, and removing the appellate power from the Supreme Court to pass on this question of constitutionality.

In this way there would be no conflict between the Congress and the Supreme Court. There ought to be none. The bodies exercising the high powers of this great Republic ought to act along lines of perfect harmony, not along lines of conflict. The people of the United States ought to know what the law is when Congress has spoken and not wait 20 years to have it declared unconstitutional by a changing court.

The people are entitled to know what the law is, and unless the acts of Congress become binding when they are passed the people never know what the law is. They may have to wait 20 years to discover that some Supreme Court thinks the law unconstitutional, and years later the court may be reversed by new members.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. What would the Senator do if it were not for the appellate court to construe the law? Take a statute of a State. Many lawyers in the State will place a given construction upon it; many other lawyers will give it an entirely different construction. The people act upon the construction placed upon the statute by various attorneys. Does the Senator contend that there should be no appellate court to construe and interpret a statute; and if the court may interpret the statutes of a State why should you not have an appellate court to interpret the statutes of Congress, the highest law of the representative body of the States?

Mr. OWEN. When the Congress of the United States passes upon a question and declares it constitutional, it is the highest competent authority in this Republic. It is the lawmaking branch of the Republic, and the judiciary is not the lawmaking branch. It is for them to interpret the meaning of the legislative branch, not to write the law under the color of an interpretation. The construction of a State statute by the Supreme Court is quite another question, which I do not now discuss.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. I have not quite concluded my answer to the Senator from Utah. I will then answer any question that the Senator from Iowa may wish to propound. Every single State, moreover, has control over its judiciary. The members of the Federal court alone are appointed for life. The Federal court alone can disregard or even defy public opinion.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. OWEN. I intended to yield to the Senator from Iowa, but I will first yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that every State in the Union, at least every one with whose constitution I am familiar, has given to the supreme court or the highest judicial court of the State the same power to construe an act to be unconstitutional that I insist the Constitution of the United States gives to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. OWEN. I do not. On the contrary, I will say to the Senator that while it is a fact some of the State courts have imitated the bad example of John Marshall, the State courts are subject to control and recall by the people of the States, and therefore a remedy exists not applicable to Federal judges appointed during good behavior—construed by the honorable judges as "for life." I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Personally I believe the child-labor law to be constitutional, and I deplore the outcome of the litigation which grew out of it; but I want to get the view of the Senator from Oklahoma with regard to the function of the Supreme Court. The Constitution says that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Does the Senator from Oklahoma make any distinction between the power of the Supreme Court to declare a law of Congress unconstitutional and its power to declare a law of a State unconstitutional?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly I do. There is a different law, of course, in interpreting the constitutionality of the laws of the States of the United States and interpreting the Federal law. I am speaking now simply of this particular instance of Federal laws. I do not wish to go into the question of interpreting the laws of the 48 States, but only the question at issue.

Mr. CUMMINS. I omitted one factor that ought to be supplied. Does the Senator make any distinction between the power of the Supreme Court to declare a law of Congress unconstitutional because it is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and its power to declare the law of a State unconstitutional because it is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be very glad to hear the distinction the Senator makes.

Mr. OWEN. I do not care to go into that discussion. I think there is a very broad distinction; but in this case I will state broadly that I agree with the principle laid down by Sir William Blackstone. That ought to be a principle recognized by lawyers everywhere, although they have forgotten it since John Marshall rewrote the law, he being the patron saint of the bar with many. I think, with Thomas Jefferson, he ought to have been impeached immediately, because he was guilty of usurpation of the veto power in declaring the law of Congress unconstitutional. But the principle laid down by Blackstone is that the function of the judicial authority is to determine the meaning of the legislative branch when they express themselves by acts, and that where the law appears to be "grossly unreasonable" it is not for the judge to set the law aside because it is unreasonable, because, as Sir William Blackstone says, that would be substituting the judicial will for the legislative will. What I want to see established is that the people of the United States shall have the power of self-government and the right to govern through their representatives and to hold their representatives responsible.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask, then, a question at that point?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose Congress did pass a law declaring slavery, subjecting the people of this country to involuntary servitude, does the Senator think that a law of that kind could be enforced? Does not the Senator think it would be declared unconstitutional?

Mr. OWEN. I will answer the Senator. He thinks the remedy would be in the Supreme Court. The remedy would not be in a court. The remedy for an act of base treachery and treason of that kind, if it were thinkable, would be first met by the retirement of every man who dared to vote for such an act, by the righteous indignation of the people of this country. That is the answer to the Senator's question, and that tells where the power lies. If Congress were to dare to pass an act of that kind, it is a question whether its members would physically survive to reach home, if they dared to go home. The Senator can not make good his plea in favor of the Supreme Court nullifying acts of Congress and usurping the veto power by so egregious a supposition.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am not going to trespass upon the time of the Senate at this late hour to discuss the legality of the child-labor law or the Senator's peculiar views upon government; but as a lawyer and as a legislator who took the oath of office which he mentions, and as a citizen of this country brought up to revere the Constitution and our governmental institutions, I can not allow the sun to go down without expressing my dissent from the doctrines expressed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

More than a century and a quarter ago our forefathers, with the experience of ages before them, formulated for the government of this people a written Constitution containing therein guaranties for the protection of life and liberty and the protection of our institutions, and wisely they divided that government into three parts—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial; the highest court of the land was established to see that the citizen was protected in his constitutional rights against the encroachments of the executive or the encroachments of the legislative, because unlimited power in all times has developed tyranny. Man is abusive of power, and over the power of the executive and the legislative was wisely placed the highest court of this land.

Sir, I believe it was a departure in the form of government. The light of this Government was lifted into the western skies, and it has illuminated the world. The guaranties of that Constitution could not possibly be enforced without a court to place the bounds upon power that overstepped the constitutional limitations. We might as well wipe out the Constitution as abolish the Supreme Court of the United States, which has for more than 100 years been the rock of the liberties of the American people.

Mr. President, I believe that the guaranties of that Constitution are better guides to follow in time of trouble and world disaster than any of the untried theories of political opportunists.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say one word.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield.

Mr. OWEN. Nothing which I have said could possibly be interpreted as any purpose "to wipe out the Supreme Court." The only thing I have suggested to wipe out is an avoidable conflict between the Congress of the United States and the Supreme Court after the Congress has declared an act constitutional. I agree with the Senator that power unrestrained is dangerous and may lead to tyranny, but the power of Congress can not lead to tyranny, because Congress must go back to the people themselves every two years and be returned again as good and faithful Representatives. So the safeguard against the development of tyranny in Congress is in the people, not in the courts, and in the Constitution is abundantly provided for.

I should like to dissent further from the idea that three branches of government were established. There were established only two branches of the Government. One was the executive and the other was the legislative. The legislative comes first and the executive second, and the judiciary is really a branch of the executive, to interpret what the law means so the executive may execute it advisedly. The executive carries it out after the executive ascertains what the law means. I need not say more with regard to it at this time.

Mr. FALL. Before the Senator sits down, I wish to ask him a question. I have heard him speak upon this theme several times. What guaranty did the different States have that the power which they retained to themselves under the Constitution should remain in them and not be encroached upon by the Federal Government? They only delegated power. The States held the power; they delegated it to the National Government. Now, what power would protect the State in the power which it retains if it were not for the Supreme Court of the United States, just as it did in the case a day or two ago?

Mr. OWEN. The States need not apprehend that they will be denied any of their just rights by the people of the United States; and if the people of the United States should determine, as a matter of fact, that a State was doing things which it ought not to do and against the interest and rights of the great majority, the people of the United States would probably find the means of carrying out their will by the power that conscientious conviction would impose and the powers of the great majority. The people would never be hasty, unjust, or tyrannical. Only minorities are tyrannical.

Mr. FALL. The people have found such means heretofore; there is no question about that. But of course the line of legislation which some people are advocating is gradually and rapidly wiping out State rights

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator very seriously that by the constitutions of the 48 States and by the Federal Constitution the sovereignty was vested in the people, and that is where I want it to remain. I do not approve the assumption of sovereignty by the Federal courts, and I am opposed to the court exercising the veto power over Congress and the President.

Mr. FALL. No; the residuum of power not directly by the terms of the instrument retained in the States, or by the terms of the instrument, or by necessary implication vested in the National Government, was retained by the tenth amendment to the Constitution in the people of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Well, the sovereignty is undoubtedly in the people of the United States and there I wish it to remain. I am defending the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FALL. Just as the sovereignty, of course, is in any people to get upon the hill and kick constitutions over and make new ones, if they want to do so.

Mr. OWEN. That is one of the powers which the people do have—the right to change their constitutions when they do not like them.

Mr. FALL. That is one of their inherent rights.

Mr. OWEN. That is one of their inherent rights, and it is declared in every State constitution, I think, without exception.

Mr. FALL. I do not know of any State constitutions containing any such declaration.

Mr. OWEN. It is contained in all of them without exception and is one of the necessary attributes of sovereignty. It is expressly and in plain terms declared in most of them, the quotations which I have heretofore placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In Senate Document No. 738, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, will be found quite a free discussion of this matter, which may be of interest to Senators who care to go more fully into the question.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand an executive session is desired for a few moments, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 7, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 6, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee for that deep and abiding faith Thou hast woven into our being, and which amid all the changing scenes of life holds us close to Thee, strengthens us for every duty, comforts us in every sorrow, and makes us wise to choose amid its perplexing problems. Life is a precious boon, but we realize that it brings with it great responsibilities, for it is writ, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord"; and whatever else we may do, grant that we may never lose faith in the love of God and His overruling power for good; that we may march on to victory, as individuals and as a Nation, now and always, under the spiritual leadership of the world's Great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NATHAN HALE.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the life and achievements of Nathan Hale, Revolutionary hero, to-day marking the anniversary of his birth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the life and achievements of Nathan Hale. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. STRONG, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Ellen Carrier, H. R. 5461, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PROPOSED VOYAGE OF HOSPITAL SHIP "COMFORT."

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. GARNER. On what subject.

Mr. HUSTED. On the proposed voyage of the hospital ship Comfort, a Red Cross ship.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I noticed in one of the New York papers that the Government proposed to send over the new hospital ship Comfort without a convoy for the purpose of testing the humanity of the German naval war lords. I did not believe that report was true. It did not seem to me that it could be possible, but I noticed in this morning's New York World a detailed statement to the effect that that ship was to be sent over absolutely without protection, without convoy, without having any defensive weapon on board, with the lights on that vessel blazing at night, for the purpose of testing the humanity of the Huns.

Now, it seems to me that this is a heads-I-win-tails-you-lose proposition from the standpoint of the German Government. If the Germans refrain from attacking that ship they will refrain from national psychological reasons and use them as an important contribution to their propaganda. On the other hand, if the ship is attacked we expose the lives of 200 men and a valuable ship unnecessarily, because I have great confidence in the ability of our Navy to protect our troop ships and protect our hospital ships on the high seas. We know that the Germans have attacked British hospital ships and we know that they have attacked the Red Cross hospitals in France.

When I was in France last winter I made a special investigation into that matter, and I found that in one case, at least, the Germans admitted that they had bombed a Red Cross hospital from the air; that they did it intentionally, and they gave the frivolous excuse that artillery batteries were located in the grounds of the hospital.

Mr. Pratt, vice president of the Standard Oil Co., returned from France a few days ago, where we had been organizing Young Men's Christian Association camps. He brings us the report that the Germans have crucified two American soldiers. We learn that in the recent attack by submarines off our coast they have riddled lifeboats with machine-gun bullets. I sincerely trust that it is not the intention of the Government to do any such foolish thing, and if it is the intention of the Government to send over a ship without any protection whatever, I think steps should be taken at once to stop it. [Applause.]

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 7237, H. Rept. No. 627) to correct a slight error.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill to correct an error. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether after the report is corrected the gentleman intends to call the report up to-morrow?

Mr. MOON. I do not know; we want to meet this evening and correct the mistake and then report it back.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It will have to be then printed, under the rule.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That will take another day.

Mr. MOON. It may.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman intend to call it up on Saturday?

Mr. MOON. I do not know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will agree to have the report called up on Monday I will not object.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman wants to object I shall not interpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Tennessee will facilitate the passage of the bill and add to the convenience of many Members if he will indicate when he will call up the report.

Mr. MOON. It will be impossible. I do not want to inconvenience any man, and I want every man to be here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee is not very well to-day, but if he will say that he will not call the bill up on Saturday it will be a great convenience to Members.

Mr. MOON. If it is a matter of convenience to any Member of the House, I will say that it will not be taken up before Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not bind himself to take it up on Monday, because that is District day.

Mr. MOON. I have not committed myself to take it up on Monday. I said I would not call it up before Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did I correctly understand that the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] was to withdraw the conference report?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I assume that under parliamentary practice it will be necessary for him to present the report when it conforms to the revised form to meet his wishes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think that he would have the right to file his report when he got ready, without any ceremony about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that it is to be presented again under the rules of the House, having been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman is contentious about it, the Chair thinks he would have to do that. So the gentleman from Tennessee had better get his report fixed up and hand it in from the floor.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4151. An act to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes;

S. 2380. An act granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors; and

S. 1549. An act to require numbering and recording of undocumented vessels.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Under the order previously adopted the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, with Mr. KEATING in the chair.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, so as to save time in the discussion of section 5 of this bill the entire question is raised upon the amendment that is pending, and I would like to present the matter before this particular amendment is voted on. The time for debate on this amendment has been limited, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have 15 minutes to discuss the provisions of section 5. It will save time afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that he may have 15 minutes in which to discuss section 5. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman's 15 minutes come out of the time which has been agreed upon heretofore for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it would add 15 minutes to that time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that the 15 minutes in addition to the 40 minutes agreed upon will constitute the entire period of time for the debate of section 5?

Mr. RAKER. Not at all. I just wanted to get the facts with reference to section 5 before the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It certainly will not be fair to give the gentleman 15 minutes and not give time to other Members.

Mr. RAKER. Having begun my statement the other night, I should like to complete it on the provisions of section 5 at this time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Still reserving the right to object, I am surprised that the gentleman needs any more time. I read with a great deal of care and interest and delight and charm and inspiration an article in an evening paper published yesterday, stating that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] had accomplished wonders, and performed the entire operation of convincing the House that his committee and myself were wrong and that he was right. Now, what does he want to talk about any more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota objects. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has 15 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has 20 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota consume some of his time?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think that is perfectly fair; but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] proposes the amendment, and I would rather have him present some reason for adopting the amendment.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, all I wish to say in reference to the amendment I have proposed is that the general policy of the States of this Union has been not to search dwelling houses or houses on the premises of suspected persons without a search warrant. There was a strong sentiment in the Committee on Foreign Affairs in favor of adhering to this policy, and a strong sentiment in the House in favor of it, and in deference to that sentiment I have offered this amendment. I do not believe it is a very important amendment, because I do not think any of the people of this country will suffer at the hands of the officials of the Department of Agriculture in the enforcement of this measure if this amendment is not adopted. On the other hand, I think with this amendment it is absolutely certain that these officials will enforce the provisions of this law just as well as they would under this bill as it was reported from the committee; and in deference to the sentiment, not only in the committee and in the House but in the country, with reference to searches without warrant, I hope the amendment will be adopted and put in the bill, as I think it will popularize the bill not only here but in the country. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported, so we will know what we are talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FLOOD: Page 4, line 7, strike out the word "without" and insert in lieu thereof the word "with"; page 4, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have the attention of Members for a few minutes, in which I shall try to present the issue raised by this amendment. It may be that after the first part of my remarks what I shall say will not be so important. Therefore I do not urge that perfect attention which I hope to receive during my opening remarks.

It is true, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has just stated, that when this item was before the committee it was the subject of much discussion and divided opinion. It is only fair to him and to others to say that the vote was exceedingly close, and the vote was taken several times. However, the fact that the bill is reported in the form it is indicates that a majority of the committee were of the opinion that the amendment he now proposes should not be adopted. Therefore I desire to have it distinctly understood by the Members of the House that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia expresses his views and the views of a portion of the committee, but that it is not a committee amendment and does not represent the views of a majority of the committee, at least as the committee was represented at the time the vote was taken.

I do not agree with the gentleman that this is not a vital matter. I consider it such. It is not vital in the sense that the bill is worthless if it is adopted at all. The bill will be a very valuable bill even if it is adopted, but if it is rejected and the language is retained that is now written in the bill, it will be infinitely better in accomplishing the purposes in view. The difference is not very great between the two ideas. The language of the bill provides this, that if one of these officers whose business it is to enforce the terms of this bill shall behold a man violating the terms of the bill in his presence, he can arrest him. Is there any man here of the opinion that he should not have that authority That is a universal practice, found in every jurisdiction so far as I know, where the English language is spoken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. It would also cover a violation of the regulations, would it not?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is entirely true. There is nothing in the bill to violate particularly. The regulations are the vital feature of the bill. The gentleman is entirely right to say that a violation of the regulation is an offense which, if observed personally, there on the ground, by the police officer, would give him the right under the terms of the bill to arrest the man committing the misdemeanor. This is simply a misdemeanor, and in every jurisdiction, so far as I know, where the English language is spoken to-day throughout the world a police officer charged with the enforcement of the law is authorized to arrest a man committing a misdemeanor in his presence. Second, if the crime is not committed in his presence, he has got to find evidence of its commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And here is where this kind of a law is particularly difficult of enforcement. Experience has shown that unless you clothe your police officers with very great power—yes; inquisitorial power; power that on the face looks abhorrent to the average man—you might just as well not write your law. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the regulations carried a penalty of some kind. Should the power of arrest be conferred upon a department officer?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They undoubtedly will carry a penalty. Of course the officer ought to have the right to arrest. It will not be his province, however, to determine the man's guilt or to impose a fine or a penalty. That will be a matter for the court.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Go one step further. Let me inquire whether the department should have the power by regulation to impose a penalty or imprisonment upon a citizen.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is a constitutional question and an important one that received consideration at the hands of the committee, as was proper. It seems to be the unquestioned law that you can intrust to an executive officer the making of rules and regulations to carry out an act, failure to obey which on the part of any citizen will subject him to arrest and punishment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think Congress ought to confer upon a department the power to make regulations which involve the imprisonment of an individual.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; I do. In this case it is necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield for a few minutes. I desire first to complete my statement, and then I will be glad to yield to any gentleman who has any question to ask. Rules and regulations providing the open and close season can not be exactly the same for all sections of the United States, because we have climate differences which must be considered. We also have geographic situations which must be considered. In different sections that which would be a fair rule for one would not be a fair rule for another. Manifestly that is a kind of legislation exceedingly difficult for a general body such as this, first, to acquire information upon; and, second, intelligently to legislate upon. That is the exact kind of subject that should be intrusted to a group of scientific men charged with the responsibility of forming the rules and regulations, and if you give them the authority thus to form the rules and regulations it naturally devolves upon them the authority to frame the punishment. It, however, is a misdemeanor and the punishment can not be very great. Let me add further——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not yet; I shall a little later. As the matter stands before the country the Department of Agriculture is not going to act in any high-handed or arbitrary manner. Let it be understood all through this discussion that the various game commissions of the United States are consulted, are giving their experience, are furnishing to the Secretary of Agriculture their advice and cooperation, and their assistance is constantly used by the department.

The various game commissions of the respective States cooperate with the Department of Agriculture in order that just rules and regulations may be adopted. Experience easily may show that a rule or regulation adopted for, say, Oregon, or for South Carolina, may not be the best. It should not be necessary that they wait for an act of Congress to change that rule or regulation. They should have authority and power to act quickly. Let me again urge that the only way on earth that any law of this kind can be made effective is by the cooperation of the people of the respective States, made officially through their game commissions. You could write all the law in the world for the protection of game and no protection would result unless you had the cooperation of the people in the various localities where the law is to operate. Now, as the bill is drawn it permits this. It permits the police officer trying to get evidence against a man who has committed a breach of the law, in order to get that evidence, to go and get a warrant and search a dwelling house. Now, ought not he to have that power? Unless you give to the agent or to the person authorized to administer this law power to search the house and premises of the man, the malefactor, you might as well not write the law at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not yield now; I have so stated to the gentleman three times. I will indicate to the gentleman when I can. It will be but a very few minutes, I will say to my friend from Wyoming. Why, just think how the matter stands. The enforcement of game-protection laws discloses that the place of all places you have to close up are the restaurants and hotels of the great cities. Those are the dwelling places, there are many people within them, and many of the hotel proprietors reside there and claim that is their dwelling house, and get away with it in the enforcement of these laws. Unless you can search their hotel, their ice box, the law is inoperative and ineffective. Suppose a man has been killing game, committing a breach of this law, and taking that game home, as he will take it home—where else would he take it—you can not convict him nine cases out of ten unless you can secure the actual physical evidence.

Mr. BUTLER. Get him and the bird, too.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Get him and the bird, too; and then you have a conviction. If he finds a man's ice box has a fine brace of Mallard ducks out of season, then it is up to him to explain how he got them, as he ought to be required to do. Any man who wants to make game protection impossible or doubtful of operation, just let him fail to support a law that will authorize a man to go and get evidence in the only place where evidence exists.

When men take a rod or a gun out into the open world, they are away from the eyes of men largely, and they carry back home the game out of sight of man and conceal it, and in order to make the law effective you have got to enable the police officer to go and seek out the evidence wherever it may be. Now, that is the usual rule that prevails wherever the English-speaking people live, that in order to search a man's dwelling house he will have to be armed with a warrant, but he can not secure a warrant until he has proven somewhat his case before the proper official who issues the warrant. He can not trust to mere speculation or some whim in getting a warrant, he has got to have a reason to believe that in the execution of the warrant the evidence will be procured and produced, and he must satisfy the issuing officer that there is reason back of his request. Now, the next step, and the last one that the terms of the bill as drawn bring into issue, is this: We authorize in the language here a police officer or the person charged with the duty of administering this law to go and search the premises that are occupied as a dwelling and to do it without a warrant. Now, that is a somewhat drastic power; no man can deny it; but I want to say to you that the experience of every efficient game commissioner in the United States has shown that that power must exist. This is not speculation on my part. We are accustomed to speak in glowing terms of the beauties of the respective districts we represent, and I perhaps may be justified in saying that I believe that northern Wisconsin and northern Minnesota to-day furnish the best sportsman's paradise to be found on the American continent; at least the parts that are adjacent and near to large bodies of people. Those two States years ago recognized, although they had abundance of moose, an abundance of deer, many beaver, otter, fox, ducks by the hundreds of millions, pigeons, plover, grouse, snipe, prairie chickens—everything, though they had them in enormous quantities, that if they were to be permitted as part of the State to bless mankind that they had to be protected. Many efforts toward protection were made but failed of result, and this is a law of Minnesota and Wisconsin. I want to say to you that the game of those two States to-day is perfectly protected. No man can say that the power given to the game wardens of those two States is ever used in a way that violates unnecessarily the rights of man. Could you submit this to a vote of the people of those two States to-day you would find it almost unanimously carried. The only people who would vote against it would be the restaurant people, hotel keepers, and the pot hunters. Now, why is this essential? Leaving out many very vital factors in the case, ducks do not flutter around great cities nor around mill ponds. You must go into the wilderness or to a lake, where people are not in large numbers, in order to find any duck shooting. That is true of other game as well. The man who shoots ducks, who shoots deer, or other game, does it almost always alone by himself. If he is allowed to take that plunder back and cache it in a shack or cache it in any kind of a shanty he might use on the place or maybe in the wilderness, which would be most likely the case, when the game warden comes and tries to get the evidence of his guilt, the man can stand and put his hands in his pocket and spit in his face, like they do. In the Northern States there are lumber camps everywhere existing. We have been trying for years to stop the pot hunters from shooting game of this kind and selling it to the lumber camps. They have at last stopped them, because they can go into the lumber camps, as the game wardens do in the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and if they find evidence of somebody's killing there, the whole caboodle of them are obliged to answer, and you can rest assured that they are careful they did not commit the crime.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will be very glad to do so now.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that this authority so written as to go into premises, but not a dwelling, without a warrant is found not only in the two States you name but generally throughout the States in the Union?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman. I intended to make that statement, but had overlooked it. I cited these two States as illustration, because I think they have been most effective of any of the States in the Union in game protection. But it is as the gentleman from Ohio has just stated, that the experience of all the States has shown that you have got to give this power, drastic as it may seem, to the men charged with the duties of administering this law, or you might just as well not write any law.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is aware, of course, that when we passed the espionage law we had a certain warrant provision in it. I would like to ask him if he thinks we should give a wider latitude to officers in the enforcement of this law than we did to officers who are engaged in seeking to round up plotters?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I certainly do, because under the espionage law you are not going to look for evidence in the lakes and in the marshes and forests.

Mr. WALSH. I am thinking of stores and other buildings?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. My dear sir, the terms of this bill as drawn are in harmony with the terms of the espionage bill so far as dwellings are concerned. This does not permit the search of any dwelling without a warrant. If you adopt the amendment as proposed, dwellings will be sacred and you can not search them at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 10 minutes on a side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time be extended for 10 minutes on a side, making 20 minutes in all.

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I want to state in advance, so that there can be no misunderstanding of what I say, that I am in favor of the policy of this legislation. I am in favor of enacting a law that will be constitutional and will be enforcible and one that the courts may uphold, one that will protect the wild life of America. But I want to say to you and call your attention to it, that section 5 as changed by the committee amendment, with the amendment now suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is unconstitutional, and the court would be compelled to hold the whole act unconstitutional by virtue of the provisions of the language therein.

There can be no doubt that the officers appointed should be officers of the United States, with the power to arrest without warrant when the offense is committed in their view and in their presence. Second, that the officer appointed by the Department of Agriculture should have the power of serving a warrant of arrest. There is no doubt on that. Third, there should be no question that the officer authorized under this act should have the power of executing a search warrant. There is no doubt upon that. But now I want to call the attention of the committee to the situation as it now stands.

Amendment No. IV of the Federal Constitution provides as follows, and this is fundamental; there is no doubt about this. Therefore, any law that Congress might enact contrary to this constitutional provision is unconstitutional and illegal. Amendment No. IV of the Constitution reads as follows:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

I want to lay it down before this House that Congress has not the power to authorize a search warrant to be used and issued by anyone unless it complies with the constitutional provisions. In other words, an officer can not search a man's place without a search warrant. And that search warrant can only be procured upon affidavit showing probable cause, and that search warrant must be issued by a court within its jurisdiction.

Now, the constitution of California reenacts the provision I have just read—Amendment IV of the United States Constitution—and it reads as follows:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable seizures and searches shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon reasonable cause supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

Now, I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that, so far as my investigation has gone this morning and last night, every State in the Union in its bill of rights has reenacted in its constitution the provisions of Article IV of the Federal Constitution. You will find them in the work entitled "The State Constitutions, by Kettlebury." The gentleman from Minnesota says they have such a law in his State. I will guarantee him right now that Minnesota has never passed a law to violate subdivision 10, Article I, of the United States Constitution, permitting search of premises of any kind or persons without compliance with the above referred to constitutional provision. Why, it is fundamental. There is no provision anywhere or at any place to that effect, and why enact in this law a provision which makes it unconstitutional and that will defeat the bill when it is brought before the courts for consideration?

I want to call the committee's attention particularly to the language of the bill as suggested to be amended. The amendment offered by the chairman of the committee to some extent relieves the objection made. But let me call your attention to the language as it now appears in the bill as thus offered to be amended by the gentleman from Virginia:

> Shall have authority with warrant—

To do what? Now, listen:

> Shall have authority with warrant to search any place if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird—

And so forth.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield for the moment. I want to convey this idea. I want to say there ought to be in the provisions of the bill the authorization of these men to execute a search warrant. Now, they can not take an ordinary warrant as provided in this bill and search any place. But under the bill, if he suspects or if he believes that it is necessary and proper to search any place or any person anywhere, he can go and search it with this warrant, and that is the authority given to him by the provisions of this bill.

The point I am contending for is that under the United States Constitution and under all the State constitutions the law in regard to search warrants is, first, you can obtain a search warrant only under certain conditions; namely, you have got to appear before a court having jurisdiction, you have got to show in your affidavit probable cause that the thing exists, that there is a concealment of money that you want, or property, or some evidence or item, or that there is liquor improperly stowed away or game improperly stowed away, and so forth; and then the court issues a search warrant, but not before or otherwise.

A warrant thus issued is a search warrant under the law. The officer, whoever he may be, knows his duty. He knows what he can do. He can go to the place named in the warrant and search it. It is wholly immaterial what such officer might think or say or suppose. It is none of his business. Jones or anyone else may have applied for and obtained the issuance of the search warrant. The officer to whom it is delivered knows nothing about it. He has the search warrant, and it is his official duty to execute it, or he may personally swear out the search warrant, and when the court delivers to him that search warrant, upon its face alone circumscribes his power or jurisdiction by the language in it. No State, I am happy to say, has ever, as yet, tried to break down by legislation that fundamental principle embodied in the Federal Constitution and in the constitutions of the several States as to searches and seizures. It was of the first amendments adopted to the Constitution of the United States, and it has not been violated. It has not been attempted to be violated. There is no reason here why this fundamental principle of American liberty and democracy should be violated. Why we should attempt to enact a law that upon its face is unconstitutional I can not quite understand. This bill can be easily amended in this important particular, and I most earnestly urge upon the committee that it be so properly amended before it leaves the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have five minutes more in order that I may conclude my remarks on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. If we can not have debate on this subject, I want a full House here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withdraw it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withhold his point?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, to the end that my argument may be applicable, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed amendment be read now, so that it can be discussed by other Members when the time comes. May I have that by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pending amendment will be reported by the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a substitute for section 5?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is to be read for information.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is not offered for consideration at this time. I think it is not in order. I think it is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARAWAY. The time was allotted for general debate on this question of the Flood amendment. Now, then, the gentleman from California proposes in that time to offer another amendment, which may be a substantial amendment, in the time allotted for the discussion of the other matter, some of which has already been consumed.

Mr. RAKER. This is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Query: Will the remainder of the time allotted now be consumed practically in the discussion of this new amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. The House by unanimous consent permits the Clerk to read this amendment to the House, not to interfere with the time arrangement previously made. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in writing, from time to time, appoint and authorize employees of the Department of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act, which persons so appointed, after taking the constitutional oath of office and otherwise qualifying under the law, shall be public officers and shall have all the powers and authority of United States marshals or other peace officers to make arrests for violating any of the provisions of this act and to serve all processes and notices in the enforcement of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withdraw his point?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the demand for the present, to see if we can have further time for debate on this important subject.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman was not anxious for time on the other side.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made the request for time on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion is out of order.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the amendment which I offered. The bill as reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs provided for a search of dwelling houses with a warrant and for a search of other places, including buildings upon the premises of suspected persons, without a warrant. The amendment I propose changes the bill as reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by requiring a search warrant to search any place. That is the whole issue between the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and myself.

I said awhile ago that I did not think the amendment was of any great importance, because I believe that the bill as reported by the committee, or with this amendment, will be enforced by the agents of the Department of Agriculture, and that these birds will be protected. I believe that will be the case, whether my amendment is adopted or not. But there is a widespread sentiment in this country and in this House, which developed in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, against the enactment of a law to permit the search of any building by these officers without their having first procured a search warrant. And so, in deference to that sentiment and, as I believe, to strengthen and to popularize this bill in the country, I offered that amendment. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that that is the sole difference between the gentleman from Minnesota and myself upon this amendment. I trust the amendment, in deference to the sentiment to which I have referred and for the purpose of popularizing this measure in the country, will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have the word "search" before the word "warrant"? You have been referring to other warrants.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. I think that is a good suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. FLOOD. So that instead of reading "with warrant," it will read "with a search warrant."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment, without objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. FLOOD: Page 4, line 7, strike out the word "without" and insert in lieu thereof the words "with a search," so that the line will read as amended "and shall have authority with a search warrant to search any place."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the original amendment be reported again as it will be after it is perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition submitted is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I mean the exact language upon which we are going to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. As modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment as offered by Mr. FLOOD: Page 4, line 7, strike out the word "without" and insert in lieu thereof the words "with a search"; and on page 4, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I notice that in the last clause just read by the Clerk the word "search" does not appear before the word "warrant."

Mr. FLOOD. Those are the words which it is proposed to strike out.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. A vote on this modified amendment to the amendment will not close debate on the committee amendment, will it?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BLAND. I want to be heard in favor of the committee amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of confusion about how the amendment stands.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair endeavor to state the proposition. The committee have offered an amendment to section 5. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has offered an amendment to that amendment. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is in the modified form just reported by the Clerk. The vote is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I have the indulgence of the Chair for just a moment, and the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The reason I have asked that this be reread is because I know the gentleman wants his amendment to provide this——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. Is the gentleman going to argue the amendment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not. I am simply trying to get the language to correspond with what the gentleman is asking, so that we will make no mistake. The gentleman desires his amendment to enable the searching of a dwelling with a warrant, and the searching of any other place with a warrant, too. He has stricken out language which, in my judgment, leaves it in grave doubt at least whether a man armed with a warrant could search a dwelling, because the word "dwelling" where specifically mentioned is stricken entirely from the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. STAFFORD. This is proceeding by unanimous consent. In view of the gentleman's objection to extending the time, I think we ought to have some understanding, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, which is the vote on the amendment to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. FLOOD was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following: Page 4, line 13, after the word "act," insert a period and strike out the words "or of any regulation made pursuant thereto."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am not enough of a lawyer to discuss this with the constitutional lawyers of the House, but I am enough of a layman to express the hope that we will reserve to the Congress of the United States the power to enact such penal laws as may be necessary. I do not believe we ought to encourage the punishment of our citizens by regulations made by bureaus or departments, but that is exactly what we are doing here. If I understood aright the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], I understood that this bill intended to confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make regulations which, if violated, would permit any agent of the Secretary of Agriculture to arrest a citizen and to put him in jail. Now, it seems to me the Congress ought to enact the law which fixes the punishment for crime. I do not believe that function should be left with the secretary of a department or the chief of a bureau or any other one of the branches of the Government, except Congress.

I observe that in section 6 provision is made for the punishment of those who shall violate the provisions of the act and the regulations of the department, and that it is denominated a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof before a court the culprit is to be fined not more than $500 and may be imprisoned for as long as six months, and that at the direction not of Congress itself but of the secretary of the department or of a bureau which makes to the secretary a recommendation as to the punishment that shall be inflicted upon those who violate the regulations. It may be that my amendment is all wrong—I do not know—but there was no opportunity to discuss it fairly under the arrangement made as to the limitation of the time for debate, and it seems to me the point ought to be made by way of protest against giving to a bureau or a department chief power to punish and imprison our citizens.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this section the punishment is under the direction of the court, upon trial and conviction, the same as under any penal statute. The department has nothing whatever to do with the punishment. Its only function is to furnish the information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the court is to inflict the punishment for a violation of a regulation of the department. That is the point. I do not think we should put it in the power of one man to put another in jail by regulation.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has misconstrued the purpose of the words that he moves to strike out. If he would offer his amendment in a different shape, I think it would help the bill. I suggest that he strike out not only the words that he proposes to, but all of the words in line 9, beginning with the word "if" down to and including the word "thereto" in line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I will take the floor in my own right. The words I propose to strike out read:

If he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not object to striking that out.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. You might as well strike out the amending clause.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. KING. Would not that permit a search and seizure for other reasons than that of locating game that has been unlawfully killed?

Mr. FLOOD. No; there has to be a search warrant and you have to specify in the warrant according to the general law the articles that the search is to be made for. The language I read, I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota, was intended to authorize the search of a building where the officers suspected these things were. Now, under the amendments we have adopted we have to search under a search warrant and these words are not necessary.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's suggestion as far as the search warrant goes clearly comes within the provisions of the law, but suppose we make it read this way: "And he shall have authority to execute search warrants." He will have authority to search——

Mr. ROSE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he sees any real danger in the words following line 13, "or of any regulation made pursuant thereto," when every regulation must be founded on the law itself and no official will be allowed to go beyond the bounds of the law?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I do not.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. FLOOD. I can not yield for a speech, I have only five minutes. I will try to get the gentleman some time.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like some time, as I have an authority which I wish to call to the attention of the House.

Mr. FLOOD. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I offer that as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out all of the words beginning with the word "if," in line 9, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will accept that substitute, if I may.

Mr. FLOOD. I offered the amendment because the amendment with reference to the search warrant was handed to me and I did not notice the relation it bore to the words which I have moved to strike out. Those words were necessary if the officer was authorized to make the search without a warrant, because he made the search then on his suspicion; that is, if he had reason to suspect that there was concealed therein any of these birds, nests, eggs, and so forth, they gave him authority to go into the building.

Now he is not acting on his suspicion; he is acting on a warrant, and these words are not necessary. He can not search any building without a warrant. Therefore I offer this amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Pennsylvania accepts the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia in lieu of the amendment I offered.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to fix the time for voting on section 5 and all amendments thereto, if we ascertain how many Members want to speak.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment as modified read by the Clerk so that we may all understand what it means?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. FLOOD for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]: On page 4, line 9, strike out all of the language beginning with the word "if," down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, so that it will read: "and shall have authority with a search warrant to search any place."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. One substitute is pending. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman to modify his request so that the time shall be equally divided between those in favor of the section and those opposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman does not see fit to make that request, I shall object.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But I reserved the right to object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] demanded the regular order, and the regular order was putting the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then, Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota objects, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this amendment should pass. I am not friendly to the bill, and I am going to vote against it; but if you pass the bill, you ought not to so amend it that it would not be worth while passing and would be a joke as a matter of legislation. To begin with, this bill in several sections provides for the delegation of legislative authority. I oppose that principle in this character of legislation. I do not think you ought to delegate the right to some whippersnapper over here in the Department of Agriculture to make it a misdemeanor punishable by being fined or put in jail, or both, for going out and killing a duck. There are 20,000 employees in the Department of Agriculture, many of them of military age with a deferred classification. I am opposed to that kind of legislation; but the bill is all based upon that theory, and the only legislation that it provides for is for certain power to be delegated to some one else to determine when you are violating the law. It is true it provides the penalty to be applied, but it also provides that another fellow is to determine when that penalty shall be applied. That is your bill; I am fighting it as such; but if you amend this section, it will not correct the other sections upon the same subject and you will have a bill that will not accomplish the purpose that even those who are in favor of it want it to accomplish. For instance, you propose to strike out the language after the word "act," which provides that to get a warrant you must show that you have a reasonable belief that such and such things exist in violation of the rules. You can not say in violation of the act, because the act does not provide anything. It merely provides that rules may be adopted. Therefore if you are going to have this kind of a law, it is absurd to strike this language out of it. As has been said here, it takes the very life out of the bill. As far as I am concerned, I want the bill defeated; but I do not want a legislative absurdity passed, and this provision absolutely destroys this section.

Yesterday a young man called on me representing the game-bird and the song-bird fellows—a nice, pleasant fellow, seriously in earnest about this bill. He wanted me to be for it. He put up a splendid argument, and I take no exceptions to his calling upon me. He has a right to do so, and I am glad to have the information that he gave me. When he left me he was convinced, and so stated, that in my section of the country, if this law as drafted passes, our fellows will not be able to kill any ducks at all. We have about the most altruistic, good-natured fellows in Indiana that you ever saw, and we are willing to give up some of the things we would like to have; but we are not willing to say that we will deprive ourselves of the opportunity to kill some of the wild things that nature gives us once or twice a year for the purpose of saving them for the fellow down in the winter quarters of those birds, and that is the very purpose of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. BLAND. I shall yield to the gentleman later. In Indiana, as I stated before, we do not get any fall shooting, because we can not shoot them; they are not there to shoot, or else they are out in the middle of the rivers. We have no lakes such as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] talks about—no wilderness to go into and get them. We have to hunt them out in civilization, down along the river banks, and you can not hunt them when the water is low, and we therefore get no fall shooting of consequence, and all this talk about pot shooting is absurd. In the spring of the year when the water is up and out in the willows we can kill a duck or two. We can not kill many, and what we do kill will not deplete the stock of ducks very much. It is down in the resorts, where they bag their 300, that hurts. I am opposed to this bill in general, and I am especially opposed to letting some one fellow in the Department of Agriculture determine what the game laws of our States shall be. This goes further than any piece of legislation that I have ever heard of coming to this Congress. Do you want to legislate by commission entirely? Do you want to make the penalty of the law subject to the will or caprice of some one-ideaed fellow in some department? It is absurd when you think about it. You ought not to tolerate it for a moment. I am opposed to the legislation for that reason, and I am opposed to this amendment for the reason that it renders the bill if passed a disgraceful piece of work turned out by this body. I was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman awhile ago which we adopted, to require a search warrant to be taken out before you can search places, yet some of the bird fellows here favored granting the right of search and seizure without warrant. Gentlemen, what malady of indifference to consequences has come over this body?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto conclude in 1 hour and 10 minutes, half of the time to be used by those in favor of the bill and half by those opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 10 minutes, the time to be equally divided between the supporters and the opponents of the measure. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Virginia that the Chair shall control the time?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair control the time.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, as I stated before, I am in favor of this bill, and I am in favor of so amending section 5 that it will make it so that it will not be contrary to the Constitution and the laws of the country.

Mr. MONDELL. And I want 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I have put the gentleman down for 10 minutes in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Virginia has made arrangements to recognize gentlemen, the Chair suggests it might be better to designate some one on the floor to control the time.

Mr. FLOOD. I designate the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to control the time in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Wyoming in opposition to the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, the unanimous-consent agreement has been modified so as to provide that debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall end in 1 hour and 10 minutes, 35 minutes of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and 35 minutes by the gentleman from Wyoming. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, before this rule is put into operation I desire to ask unanimous consent to ask one question of the gentleman from Indiana, just one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is already in effect.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I did not have an opportunity before——

Mr. FLOOD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if this bill were passed that the people of Indiana would not have any opportunity to shoot ducks without violating the law?

Mr. BLAND. I say this, that this bill gives the Secretary of Agriculture the right to close the spring and fall shooting in Indiana, and they say we are pot shooters over there and the misinformation has been stated here on the floor several times, which is absolutely without foundation. But if they have that notion over here in the Department of Agriculture, if these one-ideaed fellows have that notion, they will close the season in Indiana in the fall and we will not get to shoot any ducks. Now, the law of Indiana does not allow shooting in the spring; we are going to wipe that out, in my judgment; but you can not hunt ducks in the fall because we can not kill in the fall, because very few are there, and they only stay a short time, depending upon the coolness of the weather up north. There are no lakes and there is no opportunity of killing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] says that the passage of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia will destroy the bill. The words proposed to be stricken out are words that were put there as a condition of search without a search warrant. Now, we have stricken out the power to search without a search warrant, and therefore the necessity for laying down the premises upon which he can so search passes, and taking the words out do not affect the bill one particle. The gentleman has not looked at what is left in the bill. Having provided now that he can only search with a search warrant, the provision is made in lines 14 to 18 that—

The several judges of the courts established under the laws of the United States and United States commissioners may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue warrants in all such cases.

Therefore the conditions are laid down upon which the search warrant can be obtained and clearly laid down and are left in the bill unless the amendment, which strikes out what is merely surplusage, is defeated. So that in so far as that is concerned, the gentleman who is so much opposed to the bill will not find the bill materially hurt if this amendment which he also opposes should prevail. Now, the gentleman makes a good deal of concern that the bill authorizes a criminal offense to be created practically by a regulation of a department, and says that is new. Well, the Supreme Court of the United States has in several instances sustained the exercise of exactly such powers, and this Congress, in a matter very much more important than game matters, a great deal more important than ducks, has made the same provision in the matter of the regulation of food, fuel, and feed, making a man who violates them liable to a penalty.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I have not the time.

Mr. BLAND. That was a war measure.

Mr. STEVENSON. We have now authorized regulations, and if the matter of the violation of the regulations as to food by a man is made criminal, then surely regulations as to ducks, sparrows, and so forth, can also be made criminal without injuring the constitutional rights of the American people.

Mr. BLAND. One is a war measure.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman says also that they can not hunt ducks in Indiana in the fall, because they can not kill them. I have never been able to see why you can not hunt, whether you kill or not. There is no embargo on hunting, at least down in South Carolina; they hunt ducks, but do not kill them. I have never killed many in my life, and I live in a duck country. There is no inhibition here on hunting ducks in Indiana, because they can not kill them. So I think this objection the gentleman from Indiana has made to this bill is certainly not well taken. The objection to the amendment is certainly not well taken, if he is opposed to the bill, because taking him in his own language, he says the prevalence of this amendment will kill the bill, and that is certainly what he desires, according to his own statement. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it is rather an unusual situation where the time on both sides is controlled by gentlemen favorable to the amendment, but I know it will be distributed equally among those favoring and those against it. The gentleman who has just spoken says that the elimination of these words would not in any way seriously affect the bill. That undoubtedly was the reason the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, proposed that they be eliminated. I know that he would not for one moment ask that they be eliminated if he thought the elimination would seriously injure the bill, but I think I can prove to him in one minute's time that the elimination will seriously injure and cripple the bill.

They form the basis upon which a warrant is to be secured. It is not true that their insertion was simply to enable a police officer to make a search without a warrant. They are jurisdictional to the issuance of a warrant. That language qualifies the two clauses—first, the search of premises without a warrant; second, the search of dwelling houses with a warrant. The inclusion of these items will enable a police officer to get a warrant to carry out the terms of this bill when he has reason to believe there is concealed in a place a bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or any regulation made pursuant thereof. If that is not in this bill, when a man goes before a court officer to get a warrant, upon what is he going to ask for a warrant? What must be the showing that he makes? No man can tell; no man will know. One court might ask one thing and another court might ask something else, but the probability is that the court would say, where the language is so general as this, "There is nothing whatever upon which we could issue a warrant."

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will not just now; if I get time, I will.

In other words, this greatly enlarges the opportunity to search and find the evidence of the crime. If they are eliminated, the officers will be restricted severely in the performance of their task. And I sincerely and profoundly, humbly, prayerfully, tearfully, hope that the chairman of the committee will see that the contention I here make is correct and withdraw his request that these words be eliminated. It looks to me, gentlemen, that by the time this bill is passed it will be a lucky dog if it even has the smell of its enacting clause left on it.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is not possible to carry out effectively an act of this kind and have it disemboweled right and left.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not just now. If I get a moment's time, I will be glad to do so.

Now, I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. That is positively the most ridiculous thing I have heard attempted to-day. The language of it restricts the enforcement of this law to agents of a certain character appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture. He must know, everybody must know, if they have inquired into it at all, that it is the intention of the Department of Agriculture to utilize the State agents throughout the Nation in the carrying out of the terms of this bill. Otherwise they could not possibly do it, and no man who is in favor of the principles of this bill or of game protection at all can stand up and ask that the only man who can enforce this bill is a man that the Secretary of Agriculture can appoint, and that man probably would not be one living in the State. Do not let anybody say he favors game protection and then try to destroy every possible feature of decency about it. If a man is opposed to it, let him stand up squarely and fight it; we honor the man that opposes anything he does not believe in. But let no man come and say, with honeyed words, "I am your friend," when you will have to say, "Et tu, Brute," and then stab you in the back.

The provision adopted a few moments ago, I am frank to say, is not going to be so serious. It is going to be exactly what I intimated. As a matter of fact, the laws of the various States authorized the search of premises without a warrant, and the practical operation of this bill——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes, so that I may ask him a question.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not do it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, we are spending valuable time that might be devoted to a more useful purpose. The U boats are now barking and biting at our doors, and our boys are confronting the Hindenburg line in Europe and the great battle of the centuries is on; and yet we are spending two days passing a measure protecting meadow larks and woodpeckers.

I have offered an amendment to strike out section 5 of the bill, which I think is a most objectionable section. I want to make the bill less objectionable if possible.

I favor the amendment to be offered by my colleague [Mr. CARAWAY], which proposes to strike out of the bill all of section 5 as proposed to be amended, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, page 4, and in line 22, page 4, striking out the words "by any such employee or."

I think the whole bill is objectionable. It is an unwarranted invasion, or attempted invasion, of State rights. I will admit that we already have been for some time playing fast and loose with the sacred doctrine of State rights, and yet there are a few people left who have some respect for the rights of the sovereign States. There are a number of eminent justices who grace a certain bench between here and the Senate Chamber who have some regard for the Constitution. Many of us have modified our minds on the doctrine of State rights. The gentleman from North Carolina—and by that I do not mean my courteous and gallant friend, Maj. STEDMAN, who made the attractive speech on this bill on Tuesday, for I would not under any circumstances criticize that distinguished gentleman, because I consider that I am honored, and everybody else in the House is honored, by touching the hem of his garment; I would not go to the extent the gentleman from Pennsylvania did when he indirectly, inferentially, but I presume not with any offensive intention, accused the gentleman from North Carolina and all other Confederate soldiers with being seceders and having been guilty of treason—a very unfortunate remark and made at an unfortunate time. The inferential charge is untimely, ungracious, unworthy of the able gentleman, unfair, and untrue. I am referring to the gentleman from North Carolina, who comes from the canvasback-duck district, and not to Maj. STEDMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], in the passage of the child-labor law, invoked the doctrine of State rights against that bill. On the prohibition amendment it was by him appealed to, and on the amendment to allow equal suffrage the gentleman appealed strongly to the doctrine of State rights in opposition to that measure. He was unwilling to protect the children of the country, but now he is willing to protect the nighthawks and woodpeckers by voting for this bill and ignoring the doctrine of State rights.

Now, if we strike out section 5 of this bill we will get rid of the most dangerous and drastic features of it. The right of search and seizure has always been a harsh remedy. It is permissible and desirable to allow search and seizure to break up moonshining or counterfeiting.

But it is made a misdemeanor only, this matter of having in your possession eggs, birds, or birds' nests; and it does seem to me that it is dangerous to invest the Secretary of Agriculture with the privilege of appointing officers to make these searches, perhaps men of a kind who could not be elected to any position in the localities where they operate. Such a person may come with the end of a tomato can appended to the lapel of his coat as his badge of authority, not under oath, not elected by the people among whom he is officially acting. We give him the power under section 5 here to search a man's smokehouse or premises, and he may go into a home and search the cradle, pull out the little trundle bed and search that; go into the outbuildings under this authority; a man who has not been elected to perform this duty, who probably could not be elected dog catcher in a township where there are no dogs. Yet this bill gives the Secretary of Agriculture authority to appoint that man to perform that very disagreeable service, especially to the man whose premises he searches.

That provision ought to be stricken out. I am going to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], which I think makes the bill better, and I expect to vote for the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. CARAWAY], which I think makes it infinitely better. But I prefer to see the whole section stricken out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With reference to the necessity of this act, part of it I do not understand. I understand that in the gentleman's own State, as well as in my State, there is a very strict law forbidding the killing of insectivorous birds.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have such a law, sir.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And the passage of this act is not needed in the least for their protection?

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman is right about that. There is no reason why this bill should be passed. Every State in the Union, so far as I am advised, has its own game laws. We believe in bird conservation and in wild-life conservation. And, moreover, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] well said, this bill is not in the interest of the country boy who wants to go out and hunt game. It is in the interest of the game hog who belongs to an exclusive club and wants to go down to North Carolina or Louisiana or Florida and hunt game and kill by wholesale.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this question: Does it not occur to the gentleman that the bill should be amended, in view of this fact—it says the party shall have authority, with a warrant, to search a place if he believes that so and so is true?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. That states that an administrative officer believes so and so. It ought to be the fellow that applies for the warrant who believes so and so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes. But that is not all. The word "suspect" should be eliminated and the word "believe" substituted, which is a stronger term.

You will have all the law you need without section 5 to enforce this act. There are marshals and deputy marshals and commissioners and Federal courts. You do not need this rank and drastic provision here for search and seizure. It ought to be cut out.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. TILLMAN. Not now. Later I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

I think we are not only allowing the sacred doctrine of State rights to be invaded and utterly abolished, but we are preparing to make our boys sissies. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], who represents an intrepid constituency, a constituency second to none in manly men and womanly women—rose-hearted Virginia—I would like to know what Lord Fairfax, who used to hunt elk and wild fowl just across the Potomac in the Old Dominion, would say of this bill to protect woodpeckers and bobolinks. What would Daniel Boone, Davy Crockett, Sam Houston say of it? Let us not feminize our boys. This bill ought to be denominated "an old maid's bill." It should be bedecked with skirts, ruffled petticoats, and corkscrew curls. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will tell him what a distinguished gentleman from his own State said of this bill. Does the gentleman know D. G. Beaucamp?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not; but is he from Virginia? If he is from Virginia and lives in Arkansas, I know he is worthy. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD. He is chairman of the game commission. He very heartily indorses this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, his opinion is entitled to due respect. But I do not yield further.

I say that by this bill we may make mollycoddles of our boys. The reason the American soldiers are rendering such splendid service in France—and they are surpassing any of our allies in effective courage at the present time, I am happy to say—is because in their boyhood most of them were accustomed to active sports in the open air.

When my boys were old enough to shoot and fish I bought them shotguns and pointer dogs and fishing tackle, and I taught them how to hunt, how to fish, and how to engage in other red-blooded sports. I preferred to see them hunting with dog and gun in the forests and meadows and fishing in the streams than sitting in a parlor talking to some frizzly headed, brainless girl. I did not seek to make carpet knights of them. Boys will not shoot at a mark or a target, but they like to shoot at birds. God made woodpeckers, meadow larks, wild ducks, and bobolinks for boys to shoot.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would the gentleman restrict them to shooting exclusively?

Mr. TILLMAN. No. They have done some little judicious courting. [Laughter.] And now one of those boys is fighting with his companions in France, and the other one is soon to go.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It makes them all the more enthusiastic judiciously to court some? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and it makes better soldiers of them, if they learn to shoot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would like to have three minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. I regret that the time is already allotted. But I will yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would like to insert in the RECORD one of the most beautiful poems in the language, "To a waterfowl," written by William Cullen Bryant, of Massachusetts, when he was but 23 years of age, and I take it for granted that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will not object to its insertion, as Bryant was born in the gentleman's district, and this poem was written there.

TO A WATERFOWL.

Whither, midst falling dew,
While glow the heavens with the last steps of day,
Far, through their rosy depths, dost thou pursue
Thy solitary way?

Vainly the fowler's eye
Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong,
As, darkly seen against the crimson sky,
Thy figure floats along.

Seek'st thou the plashy brink
Of weedy lake, or marge of river wide,
Or where the rocking billows rise and sink
On the chafed ocean side?

There is a Power whose care
Teaches thy way along that pathless coast—
The desert and illimitable air—
Lone wandering, but not lost.

All day thy wings have fanned,
At that far height, the cold, thin atmosphere,
Yet stoop not, weary, to the welcome land,
Though the dark night is near.

And soon that toil shall end;
Soon shalt thou find a summer home, and rest,
And scream among thy fellows; reeds shall bend,
Soon o'er thy sheltered nest.

Thou'rt gone, the abyss of heaven
Hath swallowed up thy form; yet, on my heart
Deeply has sunk the lesson thou hast given,
And shall not soon depart.

He who, from zone to zone,
Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight,
In the long way that I must tread alone,
Will lead my steps aright.

The second stanza of this poem shows that the waterfowl can usually take care of himself and is in no danger of extermination, protected as he is by proper State legislation and being sufficiently shifty to keep out of range much of the time.

I am in favor of game and fish conservation and preservation, but, in addition to other reasons given, I do not believe in giving authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to legislate for us. We abandon our functions when we do that, and under this bill the Secretary of Agriculture may put a ban on shooting altogether. The States should be allowed to make their own game laws. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one and one-half minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield some time?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I will not use all my time. I find myself in this position, that I am in favor of this bill, but I am opposed to the provision which permits the searching of premises without a search warrant. I must oppose that provision because of the constitutional provision in the State of Pennsylvania which prohibits that.

Mr. FLOOD. The committee have adopted an amendment changing that.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the bill now provide that the premises can not be searched without a search warrant?

Mr. FLOOD. That amendment has been adopted by the committee.

Mr. ROBBINS. That puts the bill in accordance with section 8 of article 1 of the constitution of Pennsylvania, which provides "that all search warrants must be supported by oath or affirmation and subscribed to by the affiant."

I am in favor of this bill. I do not take the position that the gentleman who just preceded me [Mr. TILLMAN] has taken that this is frivolous legislation. It was shown very clearly by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who opened this debate, that this is an important bill, from the viewpoint of the conservation of our food crops, when a billion dollars a year is lost by reason of the destruction of these insectivorous migratory birds. It has developed in this debate that the geography of the United States has influenced the judgment of the Members on this floor. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], who is most vociferous in his opposition to this bill, bases his opposition entirely on the fact that as the birds fly over from south to north and rest in the State of Indiana the people of Indiana would be prevented from shooting them. He thinks it is selfish to prevent that, and that they ought to be allowed that right without restriction. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], who just preceded me, comes from a section of the country where these birds winter, and he believes therefore that this legislation is a great invasion of State rights, and says it is a striking down by Congress of the constitutional rights of his State, because it interferes with the right to shoot the birds which stop in Arkansas on their way between the North and the South.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. A very brief question.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman think it is absolutely fair for the Federal Government to permit them to kill ducks during the months of January and February down in southern Texas and Louisiana, where men go and kill them for the market, and shoot from 100 to 300 a day, and not permit shooting in Ohio or Indiana?

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman need not prolong his question. I understand it and I will answer it. I hope that gentlemen in discussing this bill will rise above the idea of the rich hunter and the professional hunter and the effeminate boy. This bill proposes a complete scheme for the game laws of the United States, and if it is enacted we will have a uniform law that will cover this country from the Canadian border to the Gulf, and that is the whole purpose of this act. The trouble with our State legislation upon this proposition is that we have so many laws trying to deal with this question that it has resulted in the destruction of our birds. In Pennsylvania we have a disinterested organization known as the "Wild Life League," composed of men who desire sincerely and earnestly to protect the bird life of our country. They meet and endeavor to do something to protect it, voluntarily contributing funds to bear the expense of importing birds into Pennsylvania that will propagate and breed there, and to increase the game and increase the bird life. Although none of them have personally seen me about it, I know that they want this law enacted. I have knowledge of their meetings, and have attended some of them as an individual citizen interested in bird life and its propagation and protection. I wish, however, to devote a few minutes of my time, not to arguing the merits of this proposition, because they seem to be overwhelming and conclusive in favor of enacting this law, but I want to devote myself to the legal phases of the question raised by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the objection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], namely, that to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make rules and regulations in relation to the protection of game under this law is a delegation of the power of Congress, that we have no right to make, and is the delegation to an individual of the legislative power which may be exercised by him in a burdensome and oppressive manner.

I want to cite the gentlemen of this committee to the United States Supreme Court case of Field against Clark, reported in One hundred and forty-third United States, which arose under the revenue law of 1890, wherein the President was given absolute power to suspend the tariff duties when reciprocal laws were passed or regulations and tariff orders entered into by other nations; not only is the power given to suspend the operation of an act of Congress, but to suspend the penalties and the means of enforcing that act of Congress. Our tariff laws are crowded with penalties all through their terms and provisions.

The distinction which gentlemen have failed to observe is a distinction that the Supreme Court draws, and it will be drawn when this law comes up before it for consideration by that court, if it ever comes up. I will admit that the legislative power must reside in Congress; that we can not delegate that to any individual, not even to the President of the United States. But we delegate to an officer of the Government the power to enforce a law that is general in its terms, and have the right to do so, and the Supreme Court have affirmed that proposition. In this case which I cite, which arose out of the tariff law, I want to call your attention to the distinction made. I quote from page 692 of the decision. The Supreme Court says in this case:

> That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

But that is not what we are doing here. Now I read from page 693 of the same case:

> Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

Now, this is the point to which I direct the attention of the gentlemen of the committee. To quote further from the same case:

> The true distinction, as Judge Ranney, speaking for the Supreme Court of Ohio, has well said, "is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first can not be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made."

Further, citing a Pennsylvania case, the court says:

> Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it can not be said that the exercise of such discretion is the making of the law.

So, in Locke's appeal (72 Pa. St., 491):

> To assert that a law is less than a law because it is made to depend on a future event or act is to rob the legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed or to things future and impossible to fully know.

Now, gentlemen, that is the distinction that exists here. Congress can not in a general law suggest these prescribed regulations as the shooting of game birds, the destruction of insectivorous birds or migratory birds that will apply to the whole United States, unless we would append to this bill a catalogue so minute in its terms that it would apply to all sections and all latitudes of our great country, and that is impossible for any great legislative body such as the American Congress.

We are passing a law remitting that duty to the head of the Department of Agriculture, and that is a duty that we have a right to delegate, because it is not legislation; it is a descriptive duty, and we have a right to delegate that to the Secretary of Agriculture just as much as to delegate the making of rules and suspending the operation of the tariff act in 1890 to the President of the United States, and by his proclamation he could find when the law was broken or when it was to be applied or suspended, and also the penalty enforced as a result of the action of other countries meeting those conditions.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is undoubtedly familiar with the phraseology of the bill. May I direct his attention to the fact that the law prohibits the killing of these birds, and it is the law that will be violated. The bill gives the Department of Agriculture the right to permit game birds to be killed at a certain time, in certain places, and in the absence of the permit by regulation the violation would be of the law. This act is constitutional and is according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, and should be passed. I am greatly in favor of protecting our birds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. ROBBINS and Mr. TILLMAN had leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out all of section 5 down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, page 4, and in line 22, page 4, strike out the words "seized by any such employee or."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I very much hope that the Members here present will read the section as it will read if my amendment prevails. The amendment is to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from creating a horde of petty officers throughout the various States of the United States and clothing them not only with power to make arrests but to make search and seizure and in every way harrass the citizenship of the States.

The time is too short to discuss, although I am satisfied this is true, speaking of the entire bill, that unless the negotiations and promulgation of the treaty between the Government of Great Britain and the United States gives Congress the power to enact this law, we have no constitutional warrant for this legislation. There is under a similar law a case pending before the United States Supreme Court which arose in my home county and has been before that court for five years. The Government has been unwilling for the court to decide it. It has had the case argued and reargued for the purpose of delay while it attempted to negotiate this treaty, under the belief that the treaty would give the Congress the power to enact laws that it does not now possess. I do not believe it does, but I have not the time to discuss it now. I am tempted, however, to digress far enough to call attention to the inconsistencies of some gentlemen of this House with respect to this proposed act. Tuesday when this matter was up for discussion an eloquent gentleman from North Carolina said that it was an invasion in fact of the sovereignty of the State, but that we ought to yield in such a matter as this. I want to read what that gentleman said about the invasion of State rights when another matter of importance was before the Congress. He said:

If the time ever comes when the States are shorn of the right to govern themselves in all local matters and are deprived of the right to exercise their untrammeled police power for the enforcement of the same, we will see the beginning of the end of this Republic.

"Whenever the time comes when the States are shorn of the right to exercise in its fullest degree its police power we will see the beginning of the end of this Republic." That was the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], and the matter before the Congress was whether we should have a sober Nation or a drunken Nation, the question of national prohibition. That police power was so important then that he could not assent to its invasion. It was such a sacred right that he who laid hand upon it, like the Ark of the Covenant, must die.

The same gentleman voted against the child-labor law. He argued against the enfranchisement of women. He said this, in effect, "Let drunkards fill drunkards' graves so long as we can preserve the sovereignty of North Carolina; let women cry out in vain for the ballot to protect themselves against unrighteous laws and conditions, for they shall be denied because the sovereign State of North Carolina alone has the authority and right to grant this redress and do justice in that matter; let children grow up in ignorance, dwarfed in body and mind, ground in the dust within factory walls, but the police regulations of the sovereign State of North Carolina must not be invaded." But when he heard the twitter of a tomtit or saw the flash of a canvas-back wing the sovereignty of North Carolina fell from him like a cloak. [Laughter and applause.] That is consistency and that is statesmanship! Let women and children cry out in vain and let drunkards go down to untimely graves if only you touch not the sovereignty of the State; but for fear that some gentleman—and he referred to a gentleman in Congress upon the Republican side—may be deprived of his winter shooting, God bless your heart, let the sovereignty of the State of North Carolina go into the scrap heap.

I want to tell you something about the provision that I am seeking to strike out. It gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to name a horde of officers, many of them without known character, without standing, certainly not known in the community that is to suffer from their activity. These will pin the bottom of an oyster can upon their coats and invade the homes of free citizens. Why, God bless you, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] particularly was filled with indignation at the idea of even requiring them to get a search warrant to take a sick baby out of its crib in order that they may look in the pillow upon which its head rests to see if there is a duck feather in it. Mr. Chairman, liberty is not destroyed from the top. We destroy it by taking away the little rights. The weak first fall victims and in their destruction rests the germs of decay that will finally destroy the State.

In my district is a game preserve. It is a beautiful lake. I know it well. I own a farm on its shore, and here, lest some one may think I want to pot hunt, let me say I do not hunt at all.

I have not picked up a gun in 10 years, and I have no inclination to do so. But this is a very fine game preserve, I presume, although I do not personally know much about it as a game preserve; but I do know the department has a man there as game warden who unfortunately learned to talk and walk but never to think or to be a gentleman. He is the most disturbing factor in that community. He is such a blackguard that no community on earth ought to be required to put up with him; yet on appeal to the Department of Agriculture to have him removed I have been promised that he should go; but he stays. I was told the department knew this man talks too much and did too little; but, as I said, he stays and stays and stays just the same. Now the power is sought to multiply him by a thousand. [Laughter.] If you have had any experience with a departmental agent, one of these who parts his hair in the middle and puts on a nose glass and looks wise and knows nothing, you know this is true—that he has the idea that his efficiency—whatever that may mean—depends upon the number of people he harasses and the amount of discontent and disturbance he creates. The author of this measure seeks power for the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a thousand of those fellows and turn them loose to protect the tomtits and harass the white people of this country. They will go out from Washington and will come back with statements something like this: "I arrested Bill Jones because I saw a duck feather sticking out of his hat, and I threw the widow Smith out of her house because I had a suspicion there was half of a bird's egg under her table. I left anger and resentment wherever I went, and I will do as well the next time." These reports, as long as the moral law covering the field of his alleged activities, will fill filing cabinets and empty the Treasury vaults. They will do nothing else except to make law odious and, I hope, plague the gentlemen who so arduously support this bill at this time.

Here is another remarkable thing: We passed a bill appropriating $12,000,000,000 the other day in a few hours with but 30 people present because it was said that we were in the midst of war and that haste was necessary. Now we stop in the midst of this great war for half a week for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to bring on the floor to have discussed this bill to protect woodpeckers and sapsuckers and sandpipers and bull bats and other very necessary creatures of his community. I want to say this in passing: I have never before complimented the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House, and I dislike to do it now, because it strikes me they already have an exaggerated idea of their importance [laughter] and their disinterestedness and their altruistic natures, but I can not refrain, for this is the first time I ever knew these gentlemen to advocate doing something for my section. Usually their efforts have been confined to doing something to it and not for it. [Laughter.] There are some of you over there now who want to fatten your ducks and geese and send them down our way to let us kill them. For this I am sure we are duly thankful, but for fear you may want to come after them we shall decline the offer.

I want to protect our wild life. I want game and song birds to live, but I also want liberty and the rights of our people to survive these "uplifters," who feel that their mission is to persecute and harass the plain people that game preserves may be established for pleasure of the rich. With these I have no sympathy. I hope the House agrees with me.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, notwithstanding the strictures of the gentleman from Minnesota

[Mr. MILLER]—and I see he is absent—I believe I am a better friend of this bill than he is. He wants to put in a provision that he knows is unconstitutional so that it will be defeated. I have a right to say that from his attitude in regard to supporting the bill, because he wants to permit a search of all premises without a search warrant.

The constitution of his State says it can not be done, and the gentleman knows it. In regard to the rules and regulations under this bill they are provided for in section 3. Section 4 says a violation of them is a crime. In the case of Light against the United States, reported in Two hundred and twentieth United States, page 523, together with United States against Grimaud, page 560, same volume, the Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress has a right to authorize these departments to make rules and regulations, the disregarding of which can be punished as an offense, so there is no question as to that. Therefore it is the law that departments have a right to make rules and regulations; therefore they have the right to say they are a crime. That being the case, it will have the right to say that one of these officers appointed shall execute a search warrant; and that is what I am trying to get at and prohibit from doing in any of these cases unless he has authority of law. What the amendment ought to be on page 4, line 7, is to state—and this will mean something—"that he shall have authority to execute search warrants," and nothing else. Otherwise it is unconstitutional. The provision left in the bill adds these three words, "search any place." In other words, the effect under the law, contrary to the constitution of your State, contrary to the law, gives him not only the right to search but to search any place.

The committee does not want that I am satisfied, and they could make it now comply with the law by saying, "and shall have authority with a search warrant to search any place provided for in the search warrant," and while they repeat that language, just simply say, "shall have authority to execute search warrants." Now, I have an amendment, which I shall ask to be adopted at the proper time when the matter comes up for consideration. What I want to suggest is, it gives the Secretary of Agriculture the same power to appoint members of his staff and employees of the Department of Agriculture. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota referred to that, that this amendment would take away the power to appoint agencies of the States and it was not workable. The gentleman does not know anything about the bill, I believe, because no such matter is in the bill, except he shall appoint them in writing; that the man appointed shall take the constitutional oath of office and he therefore becomes a public officer. Becoming a public officer, he can execute warrants of arrest; becoming a public officer, he can arrest a man who commits an offense within his presence; being a public officer, he can make and execute a search warrant under all the limitations and restrictions of that warrant, and not otherwise. Therefore, any man who is being searched or whose premises are being searched by this officer under some other course, under the law this officer can be prosecuted criminally for malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance in office. But under the bill as it stands to-day you do not make him an officer. Certainly this committee does not want and intend to do that. They want to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint employees in writing so there is a record; that they should take the constitutional oath to support the Constitution of the United States. He would then be an officer to execute the law, namely, arrest without a warrant for any offense committed in his presence, and, namely, execute a warrant of arrest, and, namely, to execute a search warrant. Then you have got some responsibility, and that will give this bill teeth by which it can be executed and by which the law can be enforced, as it ought to be, legitimately, properly, and fully. There can not be any legislation enacted that is more beneficial than it is for the conservation of the wild life of this country. The wild life of this country means so much to our people and to their interests, and we should therefore enact all needful legislation for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, I wish to use 10 minutes, and I would like the Chair to let me know at the conclusion of that time. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from California, the gentleman from Minnesota notwithstanding. We passed a bill the other day proposing an appropriation of $6,000,000 to add some 8,000 or 10,000 to the employees in the Department of Agriculture, which already has twenty-odd thousand employees, and under this bill all of those, without regard to their qualifications, as police officers would have jurisdiction to make arrests. I think under a Government like ours it is not asking too much that the officer empowered to make arrests and search and seizure shall at least have taken an oath to perform that duty in accordance with the law. How anyone can oppose as fair, reasonable, and decent a proposition as that I am unable to understand. Gentlemen who want to turn loose a lot of men who are appointed without any thought of their qualifications as police officers, without having taken the oath to perform their duties in accordance with the law, to search men's homes and arrest and hale them before Federal courts hundreds of miles away—men who desire to have that done can not have a very high regard for the principles of free government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And no bond.

Mr. MONDELL. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] to the contrary notwithstanding. It is not true that that amendment would make it difficult to enforce the provisions of this act. If the gentleman from Indiana will examine the act carefully he will find that the act itself does, by reference to the treaty, describe the acts the doing of which renders one subject to punishment. The only authority the Secretary of Agriculture has is in the matter of making exceptions to the prohibited acts. The very first part of this paragraph authorizing arrests on sight authorizes such arrests only for violations of the act, and it is logical as anything can be in a wholly indefensible piece of legislation to follow that with another provision that arrests under warrant, search, and seizure shall also be specifically confined to violations of the act.

It is a little embarrassing for one who has any regard whatever for the fundamentals of this Government of ours to discuss a bill of this kind on the theory that any part of it is tolerable. No constituent of mine has suggested I vote against it. Some of them have requested me to support it, therefore my natural inclination as a Member would be to give it support as the easiest way out. I would give it support if in my opinion it did not violate every principle of the Republic.

What would the fathers have thought of such legislation, men recently liberated from the tyranny of a bureaucracy, of officers appointed by a distant power with authority to interfere with their local affairs? They attempted to prevent that for all future time and to leave with the local authorities the management of their local affairs. Whenever we encroach upon those principles thus laid down and established we undermine the very foundations of our Government. It is curious the frame of mind gentlemen bring themselves to in a matter of this kind. Men who have so profound a regard for local rights—we call them State rights because our Commonwealths are States, but I mean local rights. Men who have such regard for local rights of self-government that they would not tolerate for a moment a proposition to invoke the Federal authority in the protection of human life and against outrage to the individual will blithely support a proposition to establish Federal police jurisdiction the country over for the alleged protection of the plover and the peedee. Such is the inconsistency of the attitude of these gentlemen.

The Supreme Court is soon to pass upon the migratory-bird law, I hope, and in my opinion most of those who have approved that law have now come to the conclusion that the decision of the Supreme Court will be adverse to the constitutionality of the measure. In that condition of affairs it is now proposed to bolster up that soon to be discredited act by invoking the treaty-making power and substituting for the migratory-bird law a law based upon the treaty-making power. Gentlemen who find they can not deprive localities of their just rights under our Government by direct legislation, owing to the attitude of the Supreme Court, would invoke another power, that of making treaties. It is now urged that because certain gentlemen sat down with certain other gentlemen beyond our borders and agreed to a certain proposition we are held and bound by it, even though if attempted in any other way it would meet the adverse mandate of the Supreme Court.

But, unfortunately for that theory, the Supreme Court has passed upon that very matter. I think no one during the debate has called attention to the case of Ward against Race Horse, found in the United States Reports, volume 163, beginning on page 504. Ward was the sheriff of Uinta County, in my State. Race Horse was a Shoshone Indian. A treaty had been entered into between the United States and the Shoshone Tribe authorizing them to hunt upon the unoccupied land of that region so long as the water ran. Some years after that treaty had been ratified the State of Wyoming was established over much of the territory to which the treaty related, and laws were enacted regulating the hunting of game. In that condition of affairs the Shoshones continued to hunt as they had under their treaty in the Territorial days, in violation of the State game laws. Whereupon Race Horse and his companions were arrested and haled into court for the violation of those laws. The Supreme Court gave that case very careful attention, and I invite gentlemen's attention to it, for it is a case directly in point, because game was involved as game is involved here, unless we are to take the extraordinary view of these latter-day uplifters, that a bird flying in the air is not game, but some form of interstate commerce.

The Supreme Court said in that case:

Doubtless the rule that treaties should be so construed as to uphold the sanctity of the public faith ought not to be departed from. But that salutory rule should not be made an instrument for violating the public faith by distorting the words of a treaty in order to imply that it conveyed rights wholly inconsistent with its language and in conflict with the rights of one of the [sovereign] States.

They did not put in the word "sovereign." I have added that, because that is what the State is, within its proper and reserved jurisdiction. And so the Supreme Court declared that, though the treaty was binding when made, it ceased to have any effect whatever when it interfered with the police power of a State and attempted in any way to shorten the jurisdiction of that State in the control of its game. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I had reserved five minutes for a gentleman who had asked for time; but the gentleman who desired to speak has informed me that he does not desire to use the time, so that I shall take those five minutes myself.

Mr. Chairman, I want in that time to refer to the rather extraordinary suggestion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] from a borrowed brief. I asked him who wrote it, because I am sure no Virginian ever wrote it. The idea of a man from Virginia suggesting that any State can be brought into the Union shorn of any power, authority, or jurisdiction held by any other State in the Union is a doctrine that never burgeoned in Virginia, of all the places under the flag, and it is not a doctrine that will ever grow or find sustenance anywhere in the soil of this Republic, I trust. The lame and halting suggestion is made that the Supreme Court held that a treaty in violation of the sovereign rights of the State of Wyoming was held noneffective because the Congress had not shorn Wyoming of its sovereign rights when it entered the Union. Congress has no power, authority, or jurisdiction to bring a State into the Union shorn of those same powers held and exercised by every other Commonwealth, and the gentleman from Virginia agrees with me on that.

Mr. FLOOD. No; I do not agree that Congress can not impose conditions.

Mr. MONDELL. We are not a Union of unequal States, some limping and halting and short-limbed and short-armed, but a Nation of sovereign Commonwealths united in a Union that will stand forever. [Applause.] And each and all of them, great and small, have all the power that any one of them has. When the Supreme Court said that the treaty fell and ceased to be effective because it interfered with the police power and jurisdiction and sovereignty of a State, it did not mean that that was so because the State had not been shorn of its power, because it could not be shorn.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman say that a Territory can designate upon what conditions it will come into the Union?

Mr. MONDELL. I say that every State came into the Union with equal power, equal sovereignty, equal control over its own affairs, and there is no difference between or among them. The question of what may be done in a Territory is altogether a different proposition.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield further.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman contend that I said that Wyoming was shorn of any of her powers?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no. What the gentleman said, if I understood him, was that the Supreme Court held that the treaty was not in force and effect, because Wyoming had not relinquished any part of her sovereignty; and that was true as far as it went, but it was only a very small portion of the truth. Wyoming could not have relinquished any part of her sovereignty and been one of the union of States.

Mr. FLOOD. I did not say that.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I can not yield further. I have only a moment more. If any of these gentlemen want to prove that the States are unequal, I shall be glad to give them time by unanimous consent to prove that at any time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one peculiar thing with regard to all of this legislation. It is the frame of mind, the psychology of the gentlemen who support it to tear down the pillars of the Nation in order to protect a phoebe, when they would not do the same thing to protect the most profound and essential right of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have that reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. FLOOD to the amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 4, line 9, strike out all beginning with the word "if," in line 9, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment to section 5 as modified by the substitute.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the committee amendment, to strike out all of the committee amendment and substitute in place of it the following——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Strike out all of line 23, page 3, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in writing, from time to time, appoint and authorize employees of the Department of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act, which persons so appointed, after taking the constitutional oath of office and otherwise qualifying under the law, shall be public officers and shall have all the powers and authority of United States marshals or other peace officers to make arrests for violating any of the provisions of this act and to serve all processes and notices in the enforcement of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: I move to strike out all after the word "authority," in line 7, down to and including the word "place," in line 8, and substitute therefor the words "to execute search warrants," so that it will read "and shall have authority to execute search warrants."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 4, line 7, after the word "authority," strike out the following: "with a search warrant to search any place," and insert in lieu thereof the words "to execute search warrants."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, what becomes of the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair that should be voted on after we have voted on the committee amendment, as it is in the nature of a substitute. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORES of Indiana) there were—ayes 55, noes 5.

Accordingly, the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARAWAY: Page 3, strike out all of section 5, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, page 4, and in line 22, page 4, strike out the words "by any such employee or."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. All the language afterwards placed in line 8, down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, has been stricken out. Does the gentleman want to strike it out again?

The CHAIRMAN. Only a portion of the words proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman's amendment have been stricken out. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARAWAY) there were—ayes 20, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. CARAWAY was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That any person, association, partnership, or corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of said convention or of this act, or who shall violate or fail to comply with any regulation made pursuant to this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Certain gentlemen argue that this bill is constitutional, and having satisfied themselves of that fact they seem to assume that the policy back of it is good and that the bill should be supported.

I do not think the bill is constitutional; but waiving the question as to its constitutionality, I want to insist that it is bad policy. We pass this bill, if at all, in order to enforce a treaty made for the protection of birds. We have other treaties of vastly greater importance than the mere protection of bird life. We have treaties which regulate the rights of subjects of foreign countries to reside in the United States, to transact business here, to contract, and to do various other things. If we are to pass laws taking away the police powers of States for the protection of bird life, why should we not pass laws which will take away the police powers of States in the protection of treaty rights of aliens relating to residence, property, contracts, and many other subjects? The Congress has the same right to interfere with the local affairs of a State for the protection of the security of the persons of subjects of foreign countries that it has to protect the lives of birds which may nest in foreign countries. If it is good policy to protect the lives of birds, why should not Congress act even in the local affairs of California, we will say, and fix it so that the treaty obligations we have to orientals may be protected?

Why should not Congress go into the State and the district of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who is supporting this bill, and by Federal statute and the exercise of Federal police powers force on Californians the mixed schools that they are so much concerned about? Why should not Congress go into our great cities, where subjects of foreign countries reside by thousands, and to whom we owe sacred treaty obligations, and interfere with local affairs there for the protection and security of these aliens?

Consider it, gentlemen. Congress ought not to bow to matters of convenience merely. We should stand sometimes, it seems to me, for principle. There is no principle more sacred to those who love American institutions than the right of local self-government, the right of the community to exercise and discharge its police powers free from Federal interference. That principle I insist on in its application to birds as well as to men to contract rights. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, this section provides a penalty of $500 or an imprisonment of not more than six months for a violation of any of the provisions of the treaty, or of any of the provisions of this act, or of any of the regulations that may be issued from time to time by the Department of Agriculture. You will observe that it is rather a severe penalty for the infraction of any game law. I want to ask the membership of this committee how many of you are there to-day who know what the regulations of the Department of Agriculture are under the Weeks-McLean law as applied to your respective States? When does the season open and close in North Carolina; when does the season open and close in Iowa; and when does it open and close in Indiana? Very few of us, who are supposed to be particularly well informed as to the laws of our country, know what those regulations are. And yet here we are granting to the Department of Agriculture the right to inflict that sort of a penalty on any person in this country at any time. Is there anything in this law which you have observed that provides in any particular way how the regulations shall be promulgated? Is there any notice provided to be given to the people or inhabitants of the country? There are no safety provisions surrounding it at all. One day the Department of Agriculture or the chief of Biological Survey may make regulations as to the killing of game in Georgia and Alabama and the next day it becomes effective, and some agent of that department can arrest your son or neighbor for a violation of a law that he knew nothing about and had no opportunity of obtaining any knowledge of.

This is a dangerous provision. There ought to be some way in which the people of a State of the Nation should be advised about the laws. I do not think it is ever advisable, at least outside of war times, for the Congress of the United States to delegate to some department of the Government the right to make laws and put them in operation as it may please; and yet that is what we are doing. Now, if we do not know about these regulations, if we can not be sufficiently advised about them, I would like to know how the people of the various States can get this information.

Now, I want to call attention to something else. Look at the preceding section of this act and you will find that the Secretary of Agriculture in section 3 is authorized to provide from time to time, having due regard for the zones, and so forth, to make regulations—what about? About the hunting, taking, capture, killing, possession, sale, purchase, shipment, transportation, carriage, or export of any bird. In other words, the Department of Agriculture can make regulations not only about the hunting of the birds but about the sale of anything connected with the life of the bird and disposition of their bodies after they are dead. In fact, an agent of the Agricultural Department in talking with me about this matter informed me that it was the purpose of the department, as soon as the act was passed, to immediately put into effect the regulations prohibiting the sale of any wild game in the United States, and another to make the size of the bag the same all over the United States. You will observe that the power written herein is supposed to be giving a power to conserve the wild bird life in this country, but it is in effect and will be a game law that will give the United States authorities the right to go into your State and say whether you shall sell wild ducks or ship them, or whether any hunter can carry them from the blind to his house. It will say how many birds you can kill and what you can do with them. Do you want to give that kind of power to the Government of the United States or the Department of Agriculture? And yet I tell you that information was conveyed to me by the head of the Bureau of Biological Survey, a man in whom I have the greatest confidence, and for whom I have the greatest respect and personal friendship.

I object to that sort of legislation. I do not believe that it is wise; I do not believe that it ought to be adopted; and I so stated to the head of the Biological Survey. I insist that the regulations whatever they may be should be made on a scientific basis, and they ought to be written into the statutory law of this country so that a man can read them and know what the regulations are.

Suppose some one wants to know what the regulations are, where will you find them? In Washington, in the Department of Agriculture; but there is no law book that contains them, except as from time to time the proclamations of the President are issued in the Statutes at Large. Many days, months, or perhaps a year may have passed before these regulations which have been promulgated will appear in these published Statutes at Large. There is no way for the public to find out about these things, and that is the principal trouble with this sort of legislation. I say to you here now, that I stand here ready to insist upon or to favor in every way that I can, regulations for the protection of our wild life and the conservation of our bird life, but they ought to be statutory law, law that will apply to the whole country, and laws that you and I helped make, and about which we can tell our constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that this is a very severe penalty is tenable. The maximum fine can not be but $500 and the maximum imprisonment can not be for more than six months. The court could fine $1 and imprison for one day. It is idle, therefore, to complain of the severity of the penalty.

Mr. REED. What is the present penalty of the Federal bird law?

Mr. FLOOD. It is the same as this. If we are going to have any kind of penalty, we had better have one that will stop the slaughter of these birds. The gentleman evidently does not agree with the general sentiment of the country and the sentiment of this House for the protection of migratory and insectivorous birds. As to his suggestion about the publication of these regulations, I will say that regulations finally agreed upon are promulgated by the President, the proclamation being published in the United States Statutes at Large, and thousands of copies of the proclamation are widely distributed in the form of a service announcement.

The regulations are not changed daily or weekly, or even monthly. They are not changed by the Secretary of Agriculture acting without advice. An advisory board of 21 members selected from game commissioners and others assist, and their proceedings are published in the game magazines and periodicals and in many newspapers. No one is liable to be taken by surprise. After these changes are made they are promulgated 90 days before they go into effect. It is the purpose and the hope of the Department of Agriculture to get behind this law the sentiment of the entire country, and it will not execute it in such a way as to drive away from it the people who are interested in the protection of these birds or who are interested in the shooting of them. Ninety days' notice is given; it is published in the game journals of the different States, in the newspapers of the different States, and then in the Statutes at Large. I can not see that there is any objection to this section except upon the part of those who are utterly and teetotally opposed to the protection of game life in this country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 7, after the word "act," strike out the words "or who shall violate or fail to comply with any regulation made pursuant to this act."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] in his speech has anticipated this amendment. He indicated the fear that I have had in mind, and which I expressed a few moments ago when offering an amendment to another section of the bill, which was accepted in part by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]. By the passage of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia in lieu of my amendment, we struck out of section 5 the words "or of any regulations made pursuant thereto," and relegated the penal force of the act to the law itself. If section 6 passes as it is written, it will be within the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to define the offenses, the commission of which would subject a citizen to criminal prosecution and imprisonment. It may be that he can go so far as to say that a man shall be sentenced to six months' imprisonment who has feathers in his possession. It may be that he will find some new method, not contemplated by the Congress, thus giving blanket powers to the Secretary to regulate as to criminal punishment. I do not believe Congress should give to a department blanket power to send men to jail. If the department wanted certain offenses made unlawful, the department should submit to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which drafted this bill, the particular offenses it desired to have included. As this section now stands, Congress votes the Secretary of Agriculture the right to punish men and put them in jail, and does not state the grounds upon which such men may be sent to jail. It leaves everything to the Department of Agriculture, an official who may be influenced by the advice of his subordinates and bureau chiefs or by men in the field. These game preserves are good things. They have encouraged the development of our bird life in the United States and have helped to stave off the wanton destruction of that life. But suppose one of the Secretary's agents has a quarrel with some one who has trespassed upon a game preserve or has otherwise incurred the ill will of the agent. The latter may "find" some violation of the regulations, report it to the bureau chief, who in turn will report it to the Secretary of Agriculture, and all that it is necessary to do then, without coming to Congress at all, is to have the Secretary make a new regulation and without the knowledge of Congress create a new offense and impose a find of $500 and a possible imprisonment of six months upon an offender. It seems to me we are delegating our power to make law in rather a loose manner.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is quite correct as to the effect of this section. It is true that the law in the preceding sections absolutely forbids the killing and the transportation or having possession of any game birds upon the part of any person, and then provides only that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make certain regulations in the way of exceptions to the application of the law. The effect of this is to put the whole thing absolutely in the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to make regulations as to which few people know the purport or effect and to provide that whoever violates them shall not merely be fined $500—for that is perhaps not the most serious part of the provisions of this section—but shall be haled before some Federal court or commissioner perhaps 100 or 200 miles away from his home and there be tried for an offense at a place where it is most difficult to show his innocence.

Mr. Chairman, I am as much in favor of protecting wild life as any gentleman in this House, but I do not believe it is necessary to pass this bill in its present form in order to protect it. When it comes to the assertion, so often made, that this bill is in the interest of food preservation, and therefore a war measure, there is absolutely nothing on which it can stand. Do not gentlemen know that practically every State in this Union—if there is an exception no one has mentioned it—already has a law forbidding the killing of insectivorous birds, an absolute law with no exceptions? There is one in my State, there is one in practically every State—Arkansas, Illinois, Nebraska, Colorado—every one that has been mentioned. Everywhere there is already full provision made for the protection of song and insectivorous birds. What are the enemies of insectivorous birds? These hunters gentlemen have been talking about? Who hunts insectivorous birds? Not anybody in my State or elsewhere hunts insectivorous birds.

The enemies of insectivorous birds are the cat and the squirrel, which is protected here in this town and in hundreds of towns all over the country, and the small boy, who sometimes throws a stone at the birds and frightens them away. Those are the chief enemies of insectivorous birds. If this House would pass an act preventing squirrels from being protected, as they are in the various towns of this Nation, they would do vastly more for the protection of insectivorous birds than this bill will ever do or can do, because it goes no further and can go no further than the States do that already have absolutely forbidden the killing of insectivorous birds. The squirrels tear up their nests, eat their eggs, fight the birds, and drive them away. I would like any gentleman to find, if he can, a single nest in all the Capitol park surrounding this building of an insectivorous bird. I never saw one, and I do not believe they can be found. Why? Because the park is filled with squirrels, and it is the same way in any town that harbors them. The squirrels are the greatest enemies the birds have, because they can assail them in the trees, tear up their nests, and destroy their eggs. Instead of some practical measure, we have here a provision with most stringent penalties which will enable any appointee of the Department of Agriculture, regardless of whether he is a fit man for the place, whether he has the necessary judgment, immediately to seize upon some citizen, haul him away from his home, 100 or 200 miles, bring him before a court or a commissioner, and have him fined $500 if he violates some regulation that he knows nothing about.

Is there any necessity for so stringent a provision? The insectivorous birds are already protected from hunters. They need to be protected from their natural enemies, but this bill does not do that. They can not nest in the woods, for there owls and squirrels drive them out, and, as I have said, in many towns squirrels, which prey upon them, are protected. Keep away the cats and the squirrels and the robins will nest on your porch, the catbirds in your arbors, the wrens in your bird houses. Restrain the small boy and birds soon learn that the safest place for them is near the abode of man. I lived for many years in the town of Audubon, in my district. It was named after the great naturalist, Audubon, who wrote that monumental work on the birds of North America and illustrated it from his own drawings. The people of that town are bird lovers, but the beauty of the squirrels attracted them, and where the squirrels are the birds nest no more.

Mr. Chairman, what we need is a sane, sensible bill, without the many obnoxious features of this measure, which have already been noted in the discussion which has preceded. I want to preserve the wild game, but I feel compelled to vote against this measure.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to take as my text the last sentence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]. He is of the opinion that no one is opposed to this bill except those who desire the slaughter of game, song, and insectivorous birds.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, if the gentleman will permit me, I will modify that statement.

Mr. MONDELL. That was the gentleman's statement in substance.

Mr. FLOOD. I modify that statement.

Mr. MONDELL. I am very glad the gentleman has modified it. I think I said at the beginning of my discussion a few moments ago as far as any influence has been brought upon me in the matter it was in favor of the legislation. Not a soul has ever asked me to oppose this bill, but some have asked me to favor it, and people whose approval I should like to have. No one has a more sincere desire than I have to protect bird life. No one has been more faithful than I have been in all proper legislation for the protection of bird life, but I do think there are alleged remedies that are very much worse than the ill they are supposed to cure. And this is one of them. It is important to protect our birds; it is much more important to protect the form of our Government and the liberties of our people. I believe as sincerely and profoundly as I ever believed anything in my life that that is what is involved here; nothing more, nothing less. The gentleman from Virginia would not for a moment approve a treaty and a law to enforce it to take from a State any of the rights suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] a few moments ago, and yet if the treaty-making power has the right to take from States the control over birds, it has the right to take from the State control over aliens residing within the State, and there might be infinitely more reason why in the protection of our Government that should be done. I have never been disposed to impune gentlemen's motives and yet I can say without betraying anybody's confidence that in my opinion many men vote for legislation of this kind, not because they believe in it, but because there is a pressure behind them from well-meaning but misguided people of certain classes and other folks who are as selfish as men can be. A peculiar thing about this kind of legislation is that it is frequently supported by arguments that are not representative of the real sentiments and purpose of those uttering them. We listened to a beautiful speech here the other day about song birds, and we all love them——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. We all love song birds and we desire to protect them, and most of our States do adequately protect them. If there be a State that does not, shame upon it; and the whole sisterhood of States should unite to see that the song birds of the Union are protected in a proper way by the local authorities. We have heard appealing arguments for the insectivorous bird, and we are asked to support legislation of this kind on the alleged theory that it is in the interest of the farmer, and that we must violate the fundamental principles of our Government in order to have the worms destroyed. But, as a matter of fact, when you reach the people who are actually the compelling force behind this kind of legislation, in nine cases out of ten they are neither especial lovers of song birds or folks who are particularly interested in insectivorous birds, but game-bird hunters, fellows who hunt ducks and geese and brant and shore birds. That, aided and abetted by the Government bureaus which desire to lord it over the people, is the force that is behind this legislation. Most of the talk of song birds, birds that destroy worms and grubs, is mere camouflage spread abroad to catch the well meaning, the unthinking, and the unwary. For the purpose of making a holiday for the duck hunter some gentlemen would allow a department of the Government to break down all of the police regulations of every State in the Union. We may come to that sort of thing in full fruit and flower under this flag, and if we do it will be a sorry day for the Republic. It may require the establishment of a meddlesome, pestiferous game-bird bureaucracy in this Nation to bring people to a realizing sense of its obnoxious character.

Republics are generally safe from outside assaults. The vigor, the virility, and patriotism of their people have generally protected them from the enemy beyond their gates. When they have failed, decayed, and fallen it has been generally due to the fact that they have allowed the insidious growth of centralization and bureaucracy to undermine the liberties of the people.

Yes, protect the birds, but protect first human beings, and if it is necessary to extend Federal jurisdiction to do that, I will support it. Protect the birds——

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. Protect the birds, but it is not necessary to change the form and character of our Government in order to do that. If we are to destroy local government and State jurisdiction, for Heaven's sake and in Heaven's name let us do it in a cause that is worthy, and not that some pot hunter may have a better opportunity than he now has to go forth and bag the succulent canvasback.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I believe the language that this amendment proposes to strike out is very important to the successful operation of this bill. I do not think it is possible to have a successful Federal law in reference to hunting and preserving game without having zone regulations. Such zones can not be successfully defined by an arbitrary law of Congress. Somewhere there must be a discretionary power to define those zones and prescribe appropriate regulations, for two or three reasons. One is for the protection of the birds. The habits of birds are so different in the different climates of this country, the same birds having different habits in different climates, and the seasons vary so greatly that their protection can not be effectively accomplished without the discretionary power being placed somewhere to define zones and establish regulations therefor that apply to the particular conditions involved in the different parts of the country.

And the same thing is true in reference to the hunting of birds. If we are to have intelligent regulation for the hunting of birds in this country, it will require one rule—one open season for one zone and another rule and another season for a different zone.

Another reason I am opposed to this amendment is that it would destroy to a large extent the usefulness of Article VII of the treaty. Article VII provides that where birds are seriously injurious to the agricultural or other interests of the community the appropriate authority of the Government may make regulations permitting the killing of such birds so destroying property. That is a very important section of the treaty. The power to make regulations provided by the treaty without the power to enforce them as provided by this bill, would make such regulations a nullity. Everyone, for instance, recognizes that the duck is a very destructive bird.

Last fall I was in a rice field in California. We now have about 79,000 acres of rice in cultivation there, an infant industry in California. In one field I saw 20 acres of rice that was not cut because the ducks had entirely destroyed it. It was not worth cutting. Now, how are those rice fields going to be protected under Federal law if you take away the discretion of the Department of Agriculture or if you take away the power to prescribe a penalty for the violation of the regulations? You deny the State power to protect against such condition and you render the Federal Government powerless to give protection. It is necessary for somebody to have the discretionary power to prescribe the rules to meet these troubles as they arise.

Now, the serious condition, for instance, that I have mentioned never existed in California until last year. We did not have the rice industry there until within the last four years. Such a condition can be adequately met only by conferring on somebody a discretionary power that can be promptly exercised to meet the exigency. Rice grown on 20 acres was uncut. Rice was yielding 35 sacks to the acre. So this was a tremendous loss. Some members of the Rice Growers' Association of California have estimated the damage done to the rice crop of that State amounted to $1,000,000 on the 79,000 acres of rice grown. So the importance of giving some discretionary power the right to prescribe rules and to enforce them is of vital importance to the successful operation of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 5, lines 6 and 7, after the word "of," in line 6, strike out the words "said convention or of."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the effect of that amendment is simply to strike out the requirement of this act, the inclusion of the provisions of the convention upon which this bill is based, especially as a part of the law the violation of the provisions of which shall subject a citizen to punishment. I can not see any reason why this convention or treaty should be mentioned in the law as a part of it. This convention will not be printed in the Revised Statutes of the United States. It is not a part of the Revised Statutes. The men that violate the provisions of this law will look at the statute, and if you should go into a lawyer's office and ask him what the law is in regard to hunting he would at once turn to the Revised Statutes, and he would see what this statute provided, but he would not find the treaty printed there.

Mr. FLOOD. He would see the treaty, statute, and regulations.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no authorization to publish as a part of the Revised Statutes the treaty between the United States and Canada.

Mr. FLOOD. The regulations along with the treaty and statute will be sent to the President, and he will issue a proclamation, and they will all be printed with the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman may believe that, but I would like to have his authority for his belief. I say there has not been any authority shown during this debate, nor can there be any, that the compiler of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or the Clerk of this House, will certify the treaty between Great Britain and the United States as a part of that statute. It will not be there at all. The provisions of the statute will be there, the penal provisions will be available to every hunter and every attorney that looks at the law, but the details of this treaty—and there are many things in it that will not be mentioned in the statute—are not to be included as a part of that statute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman's belief is that if a man in Alaska killed a migratory bird, and was haled before a magistrate, they might have some difficulty in just finding whether that particular bird was included in the treaty or not?

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly. He would not have the treaty before him or available. He would have no way of discovering whether that was one of the prohibited birds or not.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is it not true that in reading section 2 of the act you are relegated to consider and find out to what the act applies?

Mr. ROBBINS. That is a different proposition. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have here a penal clause. What the act refers to is a different thing. This provision here is a penal clause that subjects a man to a fine of $500 or six months' imprisonment, or both.

Notice ought to be given to every citizen, before he is subjected to any penal clause of a statute of what he is called upon to observe. I say there ought to be omitted from this section those words, "who shall violate any of the provisions of said convention." Then the meaning would be clear. It should be, "Who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or who shall violate or fail to comply with any regulation made pursuant to this act."

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman feel that we ought not to provide against the violation of the terms of this treaty that we have entered into and ratified and exchange ratifications? Are we not under obligation to prevent its being abused and violated?

Mr. ROBBINS. This act is passed to carry into effect this treaty in the United States. That is what we are legislating about. It is not self-acting. We are passing this act to do that. To put in force a treaty between the United States and Canada I am greatly in favor of this bill, but do not want it to contain provisions that will nullify any of its provisions. Let us strengthen it all we can and hasten to pass it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that so intelligent a gentleman as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] should have listened to the debate and the discussion of this bill for two days without discovering the character of the legislation. He is now suggesting some of the absurdities of the proposed law. That is the trouble with this whole business. Most of the gentlemen will only discover the absurdities of the measure after it is on the statute books; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania has glimpsed some of them just before the final vote. Why, of course, it is absurd to pass a law assuming to make it a crime or misdemeanor to do or perform an act without prescribing in the statute the character of the act which it becomes a crime or misdemeanor to do or to perform. But the part of the bill we are now discussing is in perfect harmony with the balance of it in that regard. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is for the bill, certainly does not want to throw the whole blooming thing out of gear by amending the latter part of the bill out of harmony with the proposition contained in the first sections.

Of course, it is absurd. What are you going to do in a case like this: A barefoot boy, as barefoot boys sometimes do, largely through inadvertence and without meaning anything wrong, happens to throw a stone at and strikes and injures a robin's nest and breaks one of the eggs, whereupon he is hauled before a court for violation of a solemn treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Provinces of Canada. Just how you are going to determine whether the bird that laid the egg flew across the Province of Ontario this year or no I do not know, but I assume it will be necessary to prove that before you can convict a barefoot boy for that sort of a mischance, for ordinarily barefoot boys do not hit birds' nests when they throw at them. [Laughter.] There is one thing about this bill that really gives me pain and trouble, and that——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. And that is that the Indians of the country are not bound by the blessed provisions of the treaty, but they may kill the scoter for their own use and benefit. Now, I do not know what a scoter is. I suppose I should know, and I am worried to know just how my Indian constituents at home are going to find out what a scoter is and know what their rights are in regard to a scoter that may have flown over the Province of Saskatchewan and has not been properly tagged. Now I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can say to the gentleman that a scooter is one that scoots. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I am afraid my Indian friends will be scooted under this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman about that little boy who had a stone in his hands and threw it at the bird's nest. Suppose it was a last year's bird's nest. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The offense is the same if it is tagged "from Canada."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up time in discussing this measure, although I am very much in favor of it. I wanted to call the attention of the committee to a matter that is suggested by the consideration of this bill, although not directly concerning its passage through the House.

Day before yesterday we took up the bill, as I remember it, shortly before 1 o'clock. We debated it without interruption until just before the House adjourned about half-past 5. The Official Bulletin, which is sent to our offices every morning and distributed all over the country every morning, purports to be the official record of the doings of the Government, and it carries daily a report in some detail of the proceedings of Congress. The country has the right to assume that that record is correct, that it is reasonably full, and that certainly there are no serious omissions. Whatever we may think of the migratory-bird bill, I think we shall agree that it is an important bill; that the country is very much interested in it and that it wishes to be informed as to its progress and as to any action that may be taken upon it by the House.

I have before me a page from the Official Bulletin of Wednesday, which reports the proceedings of the Congress for Tuesday, June 4. Nearly a column of the Bulletin is given over to a description of the doings of the House on Tuesday. The report describes the appearance of Alien Property Custodian A. Mitchell Palmer before the "Commerce" Committee of the House. There is no such committee. Presumably the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is meant. It describes briefly the result of the election case of Steele against Scott. It describes even the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in connection with Niagara Falls power legislation. It concludes with a résumé of perhaps a dozen bills which were introduced on that day. But there is not so much as a word of reference to the fact that this bill was considered, important as it is, and in spite of the fact that the debate, as I have said, took practically all of the time of the House between its convening at noon and its adjournment at half-past 5.

There have been repeated instances in the past of similar errors of statement or omissions in the reports of the Senate and of the House in this Official Bulletin. I have not taken the time of the House to dwell upon them, because it seemed to me that unless the practice continued and became more gross than it had been up to this time perhaps it was a matter of de minimis. But it does strike me that we are entitled, and the country is entitled, to have an accurate and a reasonably full report of the proceedings of the House and Senate set forth in this Bulletin. Otherwise there is absolutely no value at all in having these reports in the Bulletin, because a faulty, garbled, or insufficient report is worse than none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that the Bulletin should have carried the debate upon this bill?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, of course not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the gentleman think it should have carried—just a statement that the bill was called up and considered?

Mr. ROGERS. A statement that the bill was called up, a very brief résumé of what the bill stood for, any material amendments or objections offered, and the fact perhaps that it was pending when the House adjourned, at all events that has been its usual practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY rose and was recognized.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to get an agreement as to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman any proposition to submit?

Mr. FLOOD. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] wishes to speak.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was going to comment on the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], but I will not, as it is not now germane.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. With all due respect, and realizing the importance of this bill for the protection of birds, is it not more important that we should get at some legislation for the protection of our soldiers, and let the next bill on the program come forward?

Mr. FLOOD. There is no more important duty that this House can discharge at this time than to carry out its treaty obligations. We are sending our soldiers abroad on account of the violation of treaties and the principles of international law by the Imperial German Government, and we ought not to follow in her footsteps. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. FLOOD] whether it is his purpose to expedite the passage of this bill, so that the House may take up the bill for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers, which was made in order to-day? What is the purpose of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. FLOOD. My purpose is to expedite the passage of this bill without reference to any other bill. I am in charge of this bill, and I want to get it passed and get it passed as soon as possible. I would be glad to see the bill the gentleman refers to come up to-day, but I can not undertake to cut off gentlemen when they insist upon debating this bill. It is not pleasant to do this, and under the circumstances facing us, it would not be in the interest of the pending bill.

Mr. FESS. Still reserving the right to object, the soldiers' rehabilitation bill was expected to be brought up to-day, and unanimous consent was asked and granted last Tuesday. I am concerned to know whether there is any likelihood of bringing that bill up to-day.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman told me just now that he would object to any extension of time. He has my permission to do that, and I suppose he has the permission of the House. I am going to manage this bill in the way I think will get it through at the earliest possible moment, and I can not make any prediction as to the time it will take, because I do not know how long gentlemen who are opposed to this bill will desire to speak upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, there was no agreement that the soldiers' rehabilitation bill should be taken up to-day. The agreement was that it should follow the disposition of this measure. I do not think the gentleman from Ohio is accurate in stating that it was to come up to-day.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield, it was generally understood that this bird bill would be brought to final action the day it was taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Understood by whom?

Mr. FESS. There is a very apparent disposition here to make this a talkfest day. I am exceedingly anxious to know whether the rehabilitation bill is in the way or not. For that reason I am going to object to any request for extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. FESS. I do not object to limiting the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, we had before us a short time ago the military appropriation bill, the largest appropriation bill ever presented to this or any other body. In spite of its magnitude and importance the discussion of it took less time than this bill which is now under consideration. Now, I realize two things; first, that the performance of treaty obligations is a binding and high duty; and I recognize, second, that the protection of the birds of the country is of great and vital importance; but in a great Congress like this, with momentous questions awaiting our consideration, with the rehabilitation of wounded and injured soldiers awaiting our attention all of one day and the greater part of another, I can not see why we should take two whole days in summoning bogies from the depths, in seeing fantastic dreams of the liberties of the Republic sacrificed because of the fact that we are enacting a migratory-bird law. Gentlemen conjure up the idea that a bureaucracy will be created, and that every innocent boy who goes out to play upon the streets and breaks a bird's egg through accident is to be haled 500 miles away and punished as if he were committing an offense of the highest degree, and with all the rigors of the criminal law. Gentlemen, to imagine such things as that and to spend time in talking about them here would be bad enough if it were done in sport. It is worse when it is seriously suggested. Why, we are talking about these things with much more eloquence, with much greater fear of dire perils than we have indulged in upon all the serious legislation which has confronted us.

Now, with these treaty obligations to be performed, with the fact that it is a good thing to protect the birds of the country, why can not we in a most momentous time like this legislate promptly and expeditiously, and let the measure for the restitution and rehabilitation of the injured and maimed human life take its place before the House? [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the idea so ably expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] that simply because one measure of great importance may be delayed another measure of great importance should be hastily acted upon. It is a regretful circumstance that some of these gentlemen who may be anxious to get away for the week end, or who have not been seen much of late, should come in and attempt to lecture the House when we are engaged in legitimate discussion. There has been no spirit of filibuster engaged in on this bill. Nearly every Member who has spoken has discussed the amendment. The distinguished chairman of the committee has proposed amendments and has asked for extension of time, and I submit that because the gentleman from Ohio is anxious that the rehabilitation bill should be acted upon is no reason why there should be an attempt to place a cloture upon Members having legitimate views to express.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. "The gentleman from New York" has been here every day, or the greater part of every day, if the gentleman alludes to him.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad to know that the gentleman from New York has been present every day, and I trust that we may continue to see him present. We get much helpful information whenever he engages in debate and the deliberations of this body.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My concern in the matter that is to come up is due very largely to the present situation which is represented to us by the Surgeon General's office and other agencies of the Government. The Senate having passed this bill more than a week ago unanimously, there is a desire among Members here to expedite it, and I am exceedingly anxious to get it before the House so that other privileged matters may not hold it up.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the gentleman's anxiety, but I will venture the suggestion, if I may without being ostracized for criticizing the Committee on Rules, that the rehabilitation measure should have been the one to be brought in by a rule at this particular time, and that this measure relating to treaty obligations might well have been deferred for two or three days.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was no request came to the Committee on Rules for a rule on the rehabilitation measure.

Mr. WALSH. If that is so, evidently those who are most interested in that measure were not as anxious as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I would like to state to my friend from Massachusetts that unanimous consent was asked for its consideration. It had been suggested that a rule be brought in, but those who were in authority thought that asking unanimous consent would be the more expeditious way, and I am so unsophisticated that I had not thought of any such performance as has taken place to-day.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has served here long enough to know that measures that apparently would pass by unanimous consent sometimes require a great deal of time for deliberation and discussion. Now, this is an important matter, and I want to submit that it was brought before the House by virtue of the treaty entered into between Great Britain and the United States; that treaty was ratified by another body, and because we had nothing to do with the ratification of that treaty we ought not to be prevented here in this branch of Congress from discussing germane amendments and considering and seeing to it that this legislation is put in proper form. If there is another measure of equal or greater importance awaiting the disposition of this measure, I submit that we can agree to lay this one aside and take up the one of greater importance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. What amendment is there pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to offer an amendment to strike out the figures "500" in line 10, page 5, and insert "100," and to strike out the word "six," in line 11, and insert the word "two," so that it will read "a fine of $100 or imprisonment for two months."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 10, strike out the figures "500" and insert in lieu thereof "100"; strike out, in line 11, the word "six" and insert the word "two."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I am inclined to think that in the country where there is still some hunting of game for food, and particularly in the country where it is proposed, under the treaty, to exempt Esquimos and Indians, there will be no opportunity to ascertain the details of the treaty which this law affect, and that many men who live far from civilization and who may kill certain birds such as Indians are permitted to kill, such as auks, auklets, bitterns, fulmars, gulls, herons, petrels, puffins, and so on, to say nothing of scooters, should not be subjected to a penalty as extreme as $500 or an imprisonment for six months, or both.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that if his amendment were enacted in the law the man who kills the birds which he specifies could be justly subjected to such a penalty as $100 and two months?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not quite understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that the man who without guilty intent killed a scoter should be fined $100 and sent up for two months?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I say that the extreme penalty is too severe.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to remind the gentleman from Washington that the bill as it stands, if enacted as a law, would not require a court to fine the man who killed a scoter $500. The language is "not more" than $500, and the fine, therefore, might be $1 and "not more" than six months, and might not be more than one day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and I want that amended to read not more than $100 and not more than two months, which I think is a sufficient maximum penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the several States and Territories from making or enforcing laws or regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of said convention or of this act, or from making or enforcing laws or regulations which shall give further protection to migratory birds, their nests, and eggs, if such laws or regulations do not extend the open seasons for such birds beyond the dates approved by the President in accordance with section 3 of this act.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill and the convention upon which it is based, they apply to the North American Continent north of the Mexican border. I notice many gentlemen have referred to ducks, brant, and geese going into Canada and then returning to the United States, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has suggested that this bill is in the interest of those who may seek to hunt these migratory game birds in the United States. The fact seems to be that most gentlemen have considered that the application of this bill, so far as the United States is concerned, ceases at the Canadian border, but as a matter of fact, a very large part of the domain of the United States begins at the Canadian border. Those gentlemen have apparently overlooked the fact that there are 600,000 square miles of the United States territory north of the Canadian border, and that myriads of these ducks and brant and geese pass over the Provinces of Canada each spring and go to the wide flats of the Yukon and the Kuskokwim and the other great rivers of Alaska. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], in his remarks, has been the only one to refer to Alaska in any manner, and he stated that there were many of these ducks and geese that went from Alaska to Hawaii, and flew direct, each year, a distance of several thousand miles. Mr. Chairman, they evidently not only go to Hawaii, but to many other of the islands of the Pacific. They go to Siberia and to Japan and to Korea, and I do not know where else they do go. This bill and this convention will absolutely deprive the Indians and the Eskimos in the far northern parts of Alaska, the miners and prospectors, and the pioneers who are building up that country from shooting or acquiring any ducks or brant or geese, for the simple reason that the convention provides that the close season shall be from the 10th of March until the 1st of September, and the Department of Agriculture will have no discretion to change or modify those dates or the close season. On the 1st day of September in each year there are practically none of these migratory game birds in that section of the country, because the cold weather has come and they have all migrated south.

Therefore the people of Alaska will largely be deprived of any hunting at all. There is no provision to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to use discretion in exempting Indians and others, particularly prospectors and explorers, from the operation of this law, as has been the case with most laws heretofore enacted on this subject. This is not right; it is not just or fair. If ducks and brant and geese are going to be killed under law in the various States, then the people of Alaska should not be deprived of this privilege simply because they are in a far-northern latitude and subjected to more trying conditions. It does seem to me that it is not more serious to kill a duck or goose while it is in Alaska than it is to kill that same duck or goose in the States or in Hawaii or in Japan. When it is killed, that is the end of it, and it does not make much difference whether it happens to be killed in January or February in some southern clime or late in August in the Territory of Alaska.

Another matter, the ducks and geese in Alaska destroy untold millions of salmon eggs and salmon fry in the innumerable streams of that Territory. Those who are best informed on the subject and most anxious to foster and preserve the great salmon supply of Alaska, amounting to $50,000,000 annually, are anxious to have legislation enacted which will provide for wardens to rid these streams of ducks and geese during the salmon season, but this can not be done without killing some of them.

Under this treaty the great salmon supply of Alaska can not be protected in this manner, even though the departments of the Government favor such action. I believe Alaska was entirely overlooked when this treaty was made, even though I notice certain exceptions were granted the Province of British Columbia and certain parts of the Atlantic coast. The treaty was made in 1916, and I know of no way in which the closed season provided can be modified; nevertheless I wish to suggest an amendment to this bill which I feel will remove some of its harshness as applied to Alaska, and therefore I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 20, after the word "act," change the period to a semicolon and add the following:

"Provided, That this act shall not apply to the Territory of Alaska in so far as it relates to brant, wild ducks and geese."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were—ayes 13, noes 25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That until the adoption and approval, pursuant to section 3 of this act, of regulations dealing with migratory birds and their nests and eggs, such migratory birds and their nests and eggs as are intended and used exclusively for scientific or propagating purposes may be taken, captured, killed, possessed, sold, purchased, shipped, and transported for such scientific or propagating purposes if and to the extent not in conflict with the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which they are taken, captured, killed, possessed, sold, or purchased, or in or from which they are shipped or transported, if the packages containing the dead bodies or the nests or eggs of such birds when shipped and transported shall be marked on the outside thereof so as accurately and clearly to show the name and address of the shipper and the contents of the package.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think we all appreciate the birds, their companionship, their beauty, and their usefulness. Around my home are a good many shrubs and trees and in my home city of Charlotte, Mich., there are many shade and ornamental trees, and a great many varieties and kinds of birds inhabit the city where I live. We all learn to love the birds and much care should be taken for their protection. I have often wondered why it is that here in the city of Washington there are no song birds or migratory birds, foreign or native, in the trees or in the parks, and the only reason I could think of is because there are so many squirrels in the trees of the city and in the parks that they destroy their nests and drive the birds away. I think that the birds are more useful, beautiful, and ornamental than these squirrels that destroy their nests, their young, and drive them away. If we are going to have a treaty about migratory birds, let us have some place where they can come and remain safely and be a pleasure and companions.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Has it not been suggested that the reason that there are no more birds here is that the eggs are cooked in the nests because it is so hot.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is not a good reason, but if they will cage up these squirrels or drive them away——

Mr. REED. Or muzzle them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or, as my friend says, muzzle them. We will have the pleasure of the birds and their beauty to please and entertain us. They will not subject us to the microbes, insects, and germs that are carried around by these squirrels. In some places they destroy squirrels. I do not know what good they are. Maybe they are a little pleasure to some. I feed them peanuts occasionally to see them sit up and eat, but if we must elect as between the birds and these squirrels, I would sooner see the beautiful birds and hear their songs than to see these squirrels stripped of half their fur or hear their chatter. Squirrels are all right in their place, but they should be relegated to the zoological garden or the tall timber and make room for some of the beautiful bird life we have heard so much about here to-day.

I would say to those who wish to cultivate birds and have them for their use and pleasure that if they will put bells on their home cats it would save a great many birds. I believe in the treaty in reference to the protection of migratory birds. I believe we should protect the birds not only by treaty but in fact as well as theory and in every way we can, and they will multiply and be our companions.

Mr. BLAND. I wondered if there were enough experts in the Department of Agriculture to superintend the belling of cats and the muzzling of the squirrels?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There ought to be a large appropriation for that. [Laughter.] Everything ought to be done to have these birds. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the unexpended balances of any sums appropriated by the agricultural appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1917 and 1918, for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913, relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, are hereby reappropriated and made available until expended for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act and regulations made pursuant thereto, including the payment of such rent, and the employment of such persons and means, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and necessary investigations connected therewith.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 6, line 22, strike out the words "city of Washington" and insert in lieu thereof "District of Columbia."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out lines 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 and insert a period instead of a comma at the end of line 19. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman and the rest of the committee to the part suggested to be stricken out, which is the provision in reference to rents and other conditions. Now, why reenact that and say that shall include the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means when you want the money appropriated for the enforcement of the act elsewhere. It says:

Made available until expended for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act and regulations made pursuant thereto.

You have your appropriation in it, and you ought not to try to include more rent here, when——

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman—and I think I am correct, and any member of the Committee on Agriculture will correct me if I am in error, I think the appropriation is made for the purpose of paying certain part of the rent and certain employees. We had an appropriation of $50,000 to carry out the present game law. All of that amount is expended, I understand, except about $2,500. In the Agricultural appropriation bill for the next year, beginning the 1st of July, there is a similar amount paid, and out of that appropriation they take care of certain rents and certain salaries in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman think that is necessary?

Mr. FLOOD. I think it is.

Mr. RAKER. Under the statement of the gentleman I want to say this: I am a little surprised at my friend who just left the floor, and it just shows the disposition of men. With all good feeling to my friend from Michigan, he wants to destroy the squirrels because he does not like their bark, their chatter, or their song, and he is willing to let the birds go. Why, I beg to say little squirrelie is not biting any eggs or eating any birds; he is just enjoying himself; he is making the children happy, just the same as the birds are. Then I am a little bit surprised to see some gentlemen in this committee, as well as on the committee that reported out the next bill, that having reported the bill, therefore you have got to swallow the bill whole. If you raise any question or make any presentation of the matter as to amendment, why it is all wrong.

This committee has amended this bill whereby they will save it from being declared unconstitutional by our courts. These Members who are so anxious and concerned about our using a few moments' time in making the bill workable ought to be, at least, patient and allow the bill to be properly discussed and properly presented. The other bill in regard to the subject referred to by the gentleman, the vocational rehabilitation of returned soldiers and sailors of the United States, will be taken care of in proper time. Gentlemen ought not to be so impatient, and ought not to think, because one differs with the gentleman who reported a bill that is unconstitutional in provision—and the committee themselves come in and ask that it be amended, and it has been amended—gentlemen should not think we are taking up the time of the House and frittering away the time of the country in trying to protect the people of this country and the rights of American citizens by protecting them in their rights and in their property against unreasonable search and seizure, which has been one of the fundamental principles of this country from the beginning. The gentleman who has been so anxious and accused the House of taking up time reported a bill that took away this constitutional right. Now, I trust this matter will not be insisted upon any more. The gentleman does not intend to be cross—he is good-natured, he has a lovable disposition—and he ought to at least permit us to consider the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the gentleman to whom he refers is not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman does not know to whom I refer.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, to whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman referred to will well know without any names being given, and I know he will take kindly the few remarks I have made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I ask to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 15, after the word "therewith," insert: "Provided, That none of sums herein appropriated shall be expended for the editing, publication, or distribution of any departmental, daily, weekly, or monthly newspapers."

Mr. FLOOD. We have no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then, it is a start in the right direction.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH) there were—ayes 34, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the amendment by inserting the word "the." I think the word "the" is missing.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the word "the" will be inserted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk, but suggest that it be amended in the first two lines to follow the amendment just adopted. It should read "Provided further."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] presents an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WINGO. I think we ought to get rid of that other amendment first. I want to know where the word "the" is to be placed. It ought not to be thrown in anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman said the word "the" was inserted after the word "of" in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] wanted the word "the" inserted somewhere, and did not say where it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following: After the amendment just adopted insert the following:

"Provided further, That no person who is subject to the draft for service in the Army or Navy shall be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of this act."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order at this place. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] is recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan offers the following amendment: On page 7, following line 9, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 12. That one of the objects of this act is to foster the breeding of migratory game birds on farms and preserves for the purpose of increasing the food supply."

And change section number of section 12.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to establish beyond all question that one of the purposes of this bill is to encourage the breeding of game birds on preserves and farms. I have been assured by the chairman of the committee that that is the purpose of the bill, and therefore I desire to have the amendment incorporated.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is a good one, and I would like to see it adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That this act shall become effective immediately upon its passage and approval.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLAND, of Indiana, offers the following amendment: Page 7, line 10, strike out the whole of section 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 13. That this act shall not become effective until the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain covering the question of migratory birds shall have been ratified or approved by the legislatures of all the States of the Union, which fact shall be determined by proclamation issued by the President of the United States."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. It is not germane to the measure that we are considering. This is a bill to carry into effect a treaty.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. It is to make effective a treaty. That is the purpose of this bill. The States have not anything to do with the treaty-making power, and the Congress can not confer that authority upon the States.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not within the province of the Chair, however, to pass upon constitutional questions. That is a question for the House to decide.

Mr. BLAND. If the Chair is prepared to rule, I do not care to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. Addressing myself to the amendment, I understand from the chairman of the committee that this treaty was ratified by all the Provinces of Canada.

Mr. FLOOD. You did not understand that from me at all.

Mr. BLAND. I so understood you. I may have been in error.

Mr. FLOOD. You are in error. I never made any such statement. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] made that statement. I am informed that not a single Province in Canada ever ratified that treaty.

Mr. BLAND. There is certainly a wide difference of information between the two gentlemen; one says they have all ratified the treaty and the other gentleman says none of them has ever ratified it. I say that all of them should have ratified the treaty and so should our States have a voice in the matter, not for the purpose of making the treaty valid but to justify this act which is proposed to enable the carrying out of the treaty. The folks down my way are not willing for some nature cranks to get together and treaty away their time-honored and natural rights without them at least having a voice.

Mr. FLOOD. Let me say that the legislature of no Province of Canada has ratified this treaty.

Mr. BLAND. I presume he takes the position that the game wardens have ratified the treaty and that that is sufficient.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Day before yesterday I read from the debates in the House of Commons in Canada, where it was stated expressly—and you will find it in the RECORD in my remarks—in the debates on the floor of the House of Commons that it had been ratified by some of the legislatures of the Provinces.

Mr. FLOOD. I heard the gentleman, and I inquired of Dr. Nelson this morning about that, and he said as a matter of fact the legislature of none of the Provinces has ratified it.

Mr. BLAND. I can not yield further.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield further to me?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to say, irrespective of what Dr. Nelson, who is Chief of our Biological Survey, has said, it was stated in the debates of the House of Commons in Canada that it had been ratified, and they certainly have better opportunities for knowing than Dr. Nelson.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this true, that, at any rate, it was referred to the Canadian Provinces?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The legislature of every Province of Canada had this treaty referred to it.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The same gentleman, in the same debate, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] read the report, made the statement that that treaty had been submitted to all of the States of the Union. He was mistaken about that, and my information is that he was also mistaken about the submission to the parliaments of the Provinces of Canada. Sir Robert Borden submitted it to the ministries of the various Provinces, and it was approved by orders in council by all except two—British Columbia and Quebec. Quebec ultimately approved the proposed action, but British Columbia, I believe, continued to withhold its assent.

Mr. BLAND. I thank the gentleman for the correction and for his usual accurate and valuable information. So we see that in the Dominion of Canada the people's representatives in the Provinces have been consulted as to what their game laws should be. They to this extent believe in keeping at least their game laws within local control. Is there any reason why the people of the States should not be consulted here? They say, "Leave it to the game wardens." The game warden in my State is appointed. He is not appointed for the reason that he knows anything about game. That office is political spoil in my State and elsewhere.

The people should have something to say about their rights to hunt, and if my amendment carries, the legislatures of the various States will have to approve, not ratify, this legislation. You understand that I am against the bill, and in its present form I intend to vote against it, so my amendment says, "All the States of the Union." I am frank about it. I want this requirement so that no State shall be denied this natural right without its consent. I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the fact that it is not necessary to ratify the treaty to make the treaty good, but it is necessary for you to get the approval of the States of that treaty before the people of the States will be satisfied with such usurpation of their natural rights; before they will concede the right by this bill to make their game laws by the delegation of legislative authority to the Department of Agriculture.

I say to you that this amendment ought to be adopted, because if the people approve of this character of legislation we can come back here and say our legislation is justified, and the President would be justified in issuing his proclamation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The States are already represented in the United States Senate, where the treaty was ratified, are they not?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; and we are represented by the game wardens, who have already ratified it. But I am not willing to pass this act to authorize legislation by proxy simply because the United States Senate have ratified a treaty. My people are opposed to legislation of this kind. It is my opinion that we should submit this proposed delegation of rights to the States, and if they approve of this character of legislation they can ratify it, and if not, I do not think we should cram down the throats of the people such legislation simply to please the game wardens and fellows of that class. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MEEKER. I will ask the gentleman if his amendment proposes that all the States shall ratify this legislation?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; upon the theory that all the Provinces of Canada approved the Canadian treaty.

Mr. MEEKER. I will ask the gentleman how he voted on the prohibition amendment and the woman-suffrage amendment?

Mr. BLAND. That has nothing to do with a squirrel law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit his amendment to be read again?

Mr. BLAND. I will be glad to have it read.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLAND offers the following amendment: Page 7, line 10, strike out the whole of section 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 12. That this act shall not become effective until the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain covering the question of migratory birds shall have been ratified or approved by the legislatures of all the States of the Union, which fact shall be determined by a proclamation issued by the President of the United States."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States provides that treaties negotiated and ratified and laws enacted in accordance with the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, and inasmuch as the Constitution confers upon the Senate of the United States the sole power to ratify treaties, and inasmuch as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] would make it necessary to have all of the 48 States separately ratify this treaty with Great Britain, I feel that I shall be constrained to vote against the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman a question. This is an act to put the treaty in force?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The treaty having been ratified, as I understand, by Great Britain, I do not know that its ratification is necessary, but it was ratified by the Senate of the United States and it stands as a law?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The supreme law of the land.

Mr. CANNON. Then what is the necessity for this legislation? If I recollect aright, I think there have been several treaties that have practically failed because after they had been ratified by the treaty-making powers the House of Representatives refused to enact legislation that would put them into force.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What the gentleman from Illinois says is entirely in accord with the facts; but as I heard the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana read, it proposes to require that all of the States shall ratify the provisions of this treaty, and that it shall not be effective until all the States have ratified and approved it.

Mr. CANNON. I am inclined to think that the amendment was in order, and if it should be agreed to and this bill should become an act of Congress, I think its operation would be postponed until all the States had approved it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is very true, because an act of Congress passed in accordance with the Constitution, if passed subsequent to the ratification of a treaty, repeals that treaty entirely or pro tanto, as it may happen to run counter to the provisions of the treaty; but I said only that I shall vote against the amendment because it proposes, in effect, that all of the States must ratify this treaty.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] believes in the referendum. I have no doubt that on many occasions within the confines of his splendid State he has eloquently upheld the principle of the referendum. Wisconsin is one of the homes and abiding places of the principle of the referendum. Now, the gentleman who believes in the referendum in Wisconsin, can not——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman becomes any more eloquent on the subject of my State will he allow me to correct the first premise of his argument?

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps the gentleman does not believe in the referendum.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not wish the gentleman to get himself into a quagmire through not knowing the facts. We have not the initiative and referendum in Wisconsin.

Mr. MONDELL. Then perhaps the gentleman does not believe in the principle of the referendum. I am willing to leave it that way.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I could not well think of a greater nonsequitur than to say that because we have not the initiative and referendum in my State, therefore I do not believe in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he did not believe in the principle of the referendum?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Wyoming understood perfectly well, but he is in one of his nonunderstanding humors to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has not said, and he will not say, that he is not in favor of the principle of the referendum; and this is a proposition to invoke the principle of the referendum. What is proposed need not, and would not, have any effect on the treaty itself. The treaty would be and remain a treaty, notwithstanding a majority of the States of the Union declined to approve it. It would be a treaty nevertheless. But the failure of the legislatures of the States of the Union to approve the treaty would be a bar against the passage of legislation by this House, the effect of which is to shorten the police powers of the States of the Union.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. A brief interruption.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman's profound constitutional argument, but I want to ask a question—perhaps, under the circumstances, I should say to propound an interrogatory. Does the gentleman think that we ought to have a referendum on the question of a ratification of a treaty?

Mr. MONDELL. I have said nothing about the referendum as applied to the ratification of a treaty ordinarily.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know that; but does the gentleman believe that there ought to be such a referendum?

Mr. MONDELL. What I am in favor of is just exactly what is proposed here, to give the States of the Union, through their legislatures, the opportunity to say whether or not they desire to have this shortening and infringement of their police powers through congressional action based on a treaty that is the only excuse for the legislation. Without the treaty there would not be any excuse for the legislation, and therefore, inasmuch as the legislation intended to carry the treaty into effect would affect the police powers of the States, it is entirely proper that the States should be given the opportunity to say whether or not they approve of that interference of their police powers based on a treaty as an excuse.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is an earnest and eloquent advocate of the principle of the referendum. Has he ever heard before this of a referendum which provided that legislation should be ineffective if there was a single disapproval?

Mr. MONDELL. If we are to have a referendum really expressive of the sentiment of the States, this is the kind to have, and this is exactly the sort of a referendum I want on this kind of a treaty. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. If there is a member of the committee seeking recognition he can not be taken off the floor by the chairman of the committee moving to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from California, but did recognize the chairman of the committee, who made a motion that is in order.

Mr. RAKER. I was on my feet seeking recognition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the Chair finally rules on the point of order——

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. RAKER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to strike out section 13.

Mr. FLOOD. I will accept the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER: Strike out all of section 13.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, being a citizen of California, respecting and believing in her laws, being a Representative from that State and respecting the Constitution of the United States, I do not believe that we ought to submit to a provision that is known to be unconstitutional by every Member of this House.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not; I have only five minutes, and I decline to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from California is not speaking to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is keeping reasonably close to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The motion is to strike out the section, and he has not said anything except about the laws of California.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman has his proposition won if he will not talk about it.

Mr. RAKER. I do not care how the committee votes on the amendment; they can vote it up or vote it down, it makes no difference. I want to make another point, and am not worried nor do not care what becomes of the amendment. It is made merely pro forma so I can get my five minutes and show why the words "search any place" may be finally stricken out either by the committee or in conference.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri can not take the gentleman from California off the floor by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Two minutes have elapsed since I made the point of order, and the gentleman from California is not now speaking to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from California off the floor by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from California yield for me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. RAKER. No; I decline to yield. The provisions remaining in the bill and which this section will affect says that you may "search any place." Now, the constitutional provision in my State says that the search warrant must particularly describe the place to be searched. The constitutional provision of the United States says you must particularly describe the place to be searched. I am with the gentleman from Virginia on the bill and in favor of the legislation. Why does not he strike out the words contrary to every constitutional provision in the country and make the bill constitutional?

Mr. FLOOD. I think, Mr. Chairman, since the able speech of the gentleman from California, that his amendment ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KEATING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1553, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read, and was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. Pending that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. I submit that the gentleman is too late with a request of that kind.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was on my feet demanding recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is too late. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 236, nays 49, answered "present" 3, not voting 142, as follows:

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT, POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the Post Office bill for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 7237. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 627).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 22, 26, and 60.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 5, 8, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 49, 51, 55, 56, 61, 62, 64, and 65, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 2 of the bill, in line 12, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 3 of the bill, in line 4, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 5 of the bill, in line 4, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 10 of the bill, in line 23, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 11 of the bill, in line 14, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 11 of the bill, in line 17, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,400,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 13 of the bill, in line 23, of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$200,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000"; and in line 25 strike out the word "the" where it first appears and insert in lieu thereof the word "this"; and in the same line strike out "contemplated by the appropriation title," so that the amendment as amended will read as follows: "Provided, That not to exceed $300,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available for the payment of this service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 14 of the bill, in line 13, strike out the word "the" where it first appears and insert in lieu thereof the word "this"; and in the same line strike out the words "contemplated by the appropriation title," so that the amendment as amended will read as follows:

"Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available for the payment of this service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 18 of the bill, in line 1 of the amendment proposed by the Senate, after the word "Winnepesaukee" insert the following: "from the post office at Laconia"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 19 of the bill, in line 22, after the word "all," insert "including increases hereinafter provided"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 22 of the bill, in line 25 of the matter proposed by the Senate, after the word "compensation" insert the word "thus"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$370,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "nor shall any of said sum be expended for star-route service for a patronage a major portion of which has been served by Rural Delivery Service, unless the services of a qualified rural carrier can not be secured"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That on and after July 1, 1918, rural carriers assigned to horse-drawn vehicle routes on which daily service is performed shall receive $24 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage, and rural carriers assigned to horse-drawn vehicle routes on which triweekly service is performed shall receive $12 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles or major fraction thereof based on actual mileage: Provided further, That the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $2,160 per annum"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"SEC. 2. That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the annual salaries fixed by law for assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, and supervisory officials, whose compensation is $2,200 and less per annum, shall be increased $200, and those whose compensation is in excess of $2,200 shall be increased five per cent; that clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades, as follows: First grade, salary $1,000; second grade, salary $1,100; third grade, salary $1,200; fourth grade, salary $1,300; fifth grade, salary $1,400; sixth grade, salary $1,500. Clerks and carriers shall be promoted successively to the sixth grade: Provided, That on July 1, 1918, clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service who are in grades 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, under the act of March 2, 1907, as amended, shall pass automatically from such grades and the salaries they receive thereunder to the new grades, 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, respectively, with the salaries provided for such grades in this act: Provided further, That the salaries of railway postal clerks shall be graded as follows: Grade 1 at $1,100; grade 2 at $1,200; grade 3 at $1,300; grade 4 at $1,400; grade 5 at $1,500; grade 6 at $1,600; grade 7 at $1,700; grade 8 at $1,800; grade 9 at $1,900; grade 10 at $2,000.

"The Postmaster General shall classify and fix the salaries of railway postal clerks, under such regulations as he may prescribe, in the grades provided by law; and for the purpose of organization and establishing maximum grades to which promotions may be made successively, as hereinafter provided, he shall classify railway post offices, terminal railway post offices, and transfer offices with reference to their character and importance in three classes, with salary grades as follows:

"Class A, $1,100 to $1,400; class B, $1,100 to $1,500; and class C, $1,100 to $1,700. He may assign to the offices of division superintendents and chief clerks such railway postal clerks as may be necessary, and fix their salaries within the grades provided by law without regard to the classification of railway post offices: Provided, That on July 1, 1918, railway postal clerks shall pass automatically from the grades they are in and the salaries they receive under the act of August 24, 1912, to the corresponding grade, with salaries provided for in this act: Provided, That the classifications and increases of salaries provided for in this section shall not be continued beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919: Provided further, That the salary of clerks, carriers and railway postal clerks shall be increased during the fiscal year 1919, not more than $200: Provided further, That the classifications herein provided for shall not become effective until July 1, 1918: Provided further, That the salaries of such other employees fixed by law or paid from lump-sum appropriations provided for in this act, including laborers in the Railway Mail Service, who receive $800 per annum or less shall be increased 20 per cent per annum; those who receive in excess of $800 and not more than $1,500 shall be increased 15 per cent per annum; and those who receive in excess of $1,500 and not more than $2,200 shall be increased 10 per cent per annum. Rural carriers assigned to horse-drawn vehicle routes now receiving a compensation of $1,200 or less per annum, exclusive of mileage allowance for miles on routes over 24 miles in length, shall receive, in addition thereto, 20 per cent of the amount of such compensation. Such increases shall not apply to the special assistant to the Attorney General appropriated for in this act and to postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes; Provided further, That postmasters of the fourth class shall receive the same compensation as now provided by law, except that they shall receive 100 per cent of the cancellations of the first $80 or less per quarter: Provided further, That, if the compensation does not exceed $50 for any one quarter, fourth-class postmasters shall be allowed an increase of 20 per cent of the compensation allowed under existing law: Provided further, That no office shall be advanced to third class by reason of the temporary increases herein provided: Provided further, That hereafter substitute, temporary, or auxiliary clerks and letter carriers at first and second class post offices shall be paid at the rate of 40 cents an hour: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to employees who receive a part of their pay from any outside sources under cooperative arrangement with the Post Office Department, or to employees who serve voluntarily or receive only a nominal compensation: And provided further, That the increased compensation, at the rate of 5 per cent and 10 per cent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, shall not be computed as salary in construing this section. So much as may be necessary for the increases provided for in this act is hereby appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 53: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 32 of the bill, in lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "assistant postmasters and other supervisory employees and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 32 of the bill, in line 16, strike out the words "April 6" and insert in lieu thereof "June 30," and in line 18 strike out the words "which bids were received" and insert in lieu thereof "contracts entered into," and in line 19 strike out the words "the declaration of the present war" and insert in lieu thereof "June 30, 1917"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 34 of the bill, in line 2, in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$300,000," and in line 6, after the word "date," insert a period and strike out the remainder of the section; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 34 of the bill, in line 16, after the word "Department," insert "but suitable for the use of the Postal Service"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 35 of the bill, in line 5, after the word "positions," insert a period and strike out the remainder of the section; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 63: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 36 of the bill, in line 21, in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23, relating to the purchase of the pneumatic mail tube system: The conferees have been unable to agree.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, as follows:

On amendments 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, and 27: These amendments relate to items of compensation for a stated number of employees at stipulated salaries, plus temporary increases for the next fiscal year provided in amendment 52, and the language inserted is for the purpose of making plain the legislative intent which made it necessary to increase the amounts to be appropriated therefor.

On amendments 2, 3, 5, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 30, 37, 46, and 51: These amendments also relate to the temporary increases for the next fiscal year for postal employees whose compensation is appropriated for in lump-sum allowances. The increases inserted by the Senate amendments are necessary to provide for the temporary increases proposed.

On amendment 8: Amendment 8 amends present law to enable postal employees entitled to compensatory time for Sunday or holiday service, if they so elect, to accept pay for overtime in lieu of compensatory time. It is deemed that such legislation is wise and in the interest of good service, since many employees entitled to compensatory service within the week following prefer to work rather than take the time off.

On amendments 13 and 15: Amendments 13 and 15 make permanent law an identical amendment which has been repeated in each appropriation bill for a number of years. These amendments will make unnecessary the repetition of the same language in future appropriation bills.

On amendment 14: Increasing the appropriation by $300,000 is made necessary by the increased cost for rent, light, and fuel in first, second, and third class post offices.

On amendment 19: The amendment agreed to does not increase the appropriation, but makes available $300,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

On amendment 20: This amendment is merely clerical.

On amendment 21: Amendment 21 makes immediately available for the present fiscal year $100,000 for mail-messenger service.

On amendment 22: This amendment relates to postage on drop letters in the city of New York, from which the Senate conferees receded.

On amendment 24: Amendment 24 relates to the mail service on Lake Winnepesaukee, N. H. A similar item has been carried in a number of previous bills, which fixed the salary of the carrier because of the peculiar conditions attending the service.

On amendment 25: Amendment 25 is a change in language made necessary by the preceding amendment.

On amendment 28: The word "regular" is inserted so as to enable the department to employ temporary railway postal clerks during certain emergencies, and is inserted to make clearer the legislative intent.

On amendment 29: The increased amount is necessary because of additional demands upon the service, provided for in this item.

On amendments 31 and 32: Amendment 31 is necessary because of an increase of $10,000 in the appropriation provided for in amendment 32, made necessary, upon the statement of the Postmaster General, that the unusual conditions require the additional amount and is in the interest of good service.

On amendment 33: This amendment requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and determine fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of mail by urban and interurban electric railway common carriers, the same as is now the case with steam railways, and provides that after the rates are so fixed, pursuant to due notice and hearing as is usually provided, it shall be unlawful for such carriers to refuse to perform the service at the rates so prescribed.

On amendment 34: Amendment 34 increases the appropriation for censorship of foreign mails made necessary because of the increased labor involved, and makes immediately available $200,000 for that purpose.

On amendment 35: This amendment is intended to prevent duplication in the censorship of mails from the military forces connected with the American expeditionary force.

On amendment 36: Amendment 36 increases the appropriation for the manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers, due to the increased demands upon the department.

On amendments 38, 39, 40, 41, and 42: These amendments relate to the supply of sundry material for the Postal Service throughout the country, and the increases provided are necessary because of the rapid growth of the service and the unusual demands for material and supplies.

On amendment 43: Amendment 43 makes available additional appropriations necessary for material and supplies, and for $100,000 to be used by the Postmaster General for the installation and experiments with mail-distributing machines.

On amendment 44: Amendment 44 changes the word "chairs" to "chains" to correct a clerical error.

On amendment 45: This amendment materially increasing the appropriation provided by the House, is necessary to enable the department to purchase raw material and better equip the shops in the city of Washington for the manufacture of mail bags, mail containers, etc. Recent bids disclosed that the cost for this material in the open market has increased approximately 100 per cent. The Post Office Department believes that with additional funds they could manufacture them on their own account with economy to the Government.

On amendments 47 and 48: Amendments 47 and 48 modify a provision heretofore carried in each appropriation bill and provide that no part of the fund for inland transportation by star routes shall be expended for star-route service which is already served by Rural Delivery Service, unless the services of a qualified rural carrier can not be secured, and make the provision permanent law.

On amendments 49 and 50: These amendments relate to the compensation for rural delivery carriers. In substance, they include provisions contained in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and provide that rural carriers on horse-drawn vehicle routes shall receive $24 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles, or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage, the same as is now provided for routes in excess of 30 miles in length. On tri-weekly routes $12 per mile per annum for each mile in excess of 24 miles is allowed the carrier. The present law respecting the compensation for motor-route carriers, who furnish their own automobiles, on routes not less than 50 miles in length is amended to increase their compensation from a maximum of $1,800 to a maximum of $2,160. The amendment by the Senate that a carrier may use such character of vehicle on horse-drawn routes as may be approved by the local postmaster is stricken out.

On amendment 52: Amendment 52 relates to temporary increases during the fiscal year for employees of the Postal Service, and, in substance, contains similar provisions to those contained in H. R. 9414, recently passed by the House, except that the salaries of assistant postmasters and clerks and carriers in first and second class post offices, railway postal clerks from grade 1 to grade 10, inclusive, and supervisory officials, shall be increased not more than $200 during the next fiscal year. Supervisory officials receiving in excess of $2,200 receive an increase of 5 per cent. All other employees of the Postal Service whose compensation does not exceed $800 per annum are increased 20 per cent; those who receive from $800 to $1,500 per annum are increased 15 per cent. The salaries of rural carriers not in excess of $1,200 are increased 20 per cent.

No increases are provided for postmasters at first, second, and third class offices, but postmasters of the fourth class are allowed an additional increase of 100 per cent on cancellations up to $80 per quarter instead of $50, as at present, except that those whose compensation does not exceed $50 per quarter are increased 20 per cent. Provision is made, however, that such temporary increases shall not have the effect of advancing the office to third class.

The provision relating to advance in grades of clerks and carriers and railway postal clerks is included, but limited to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. Provision is also made that substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks and carriers shall be paid at the rate of 40 cents per hour instead of 35 cents and 40 cents at present, making the rate uniform.

On amendment 53: Amendment 53 extends to watchmen, messengers, and laborers in first and second class post offices and to railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer clerks the privileges of the 8 in 10 hour law, and also extends to railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices the privileges of compensatory time as now provided for clerks and carriers who work under the same conditions. The provision in the amendment extending compensatory time to assistant postmasters and supervisory employees is stricken out.

On amendment 54: Amendment 54 lodges with the Postmaster General the authority to investigate conditions arising from contracts on star route, screen wagon, and other vehicle service, and contracts for envelopes, blanks and blank books, and the Official Postal Guide entered into prior to June 30, 1917, with a view to determining whether or not any adjustment should be made in the contracts due to the increased cost for materials or services because of the war and whether the facts disclose the necessity to adjust the same for materials or services to be furnished after the approval of this act. With the consent of the contractor and his bondsmen, the Postmaster General may cancel such contracts.

On amendment 55: Amendment 55 makes effective to certain employees in the Post Office Department the 5 and 10 per cent increase provided in the present appropriation bill which by reason of construction is denied them and is identical with a similar provision which has heretofore passed the House.

On amendment 56: Amendment 56 permits the Postmaster General to accept liberty bonds in lieu of corporate or personal surety for contractors, officers, and employees in the Postal Service and is identical with a similar provision which has heretofore passed the House.

On amendment 57: Amendment 57 relates to the same subject matter contained in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and permits experimentation by the Postmaster General in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities as he may select. The sum of $300,000 is made available out of unexpended appropriations for the Postal Service for the purpose of such experimentation, and direction is given that results shall be reported to Congress.

On amendment 58: Amendment 58 is almost identical with a similar provision in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and permits the Secretary of War to turn over to the Postmaster General without charge such aeroplanes and automobiles, or parts thereof, as are unsuitable for the War Department but suitable for the Postal Service.

On amendment 59: Amendment 59 authorizes employees and substitute employees of the Postal Service who enter the military or naval service to be restored after their honorable discharge from such service to the positions which they formerly occupied in the Postal Service at the salary to which they would have been promoted provided they are physically and mentally qualified. The provision in the Senate amendment which permitted members of the immediate family of such employee, or others connected with the Expeditionary Forces in Europe, to mail certain packages is stricken out.

On amendment 60: Amendment 60, proposed by the Senate, is stricken out.

On amendment 61: Amendment 61 permits the Postmaster General to adjust claims of postmasters for loss by fire, burglary, or other cause, of war-savings stamps and thrift stamps, etc., which under the law they are required to keep on hand.

On amendment 62: Amendment 62 repeals existing law authorizing the payment of $5 to postmasters for each recruit secured and accepted in the Army, Navy, or Marine service.

On amendments 63 and 64: Amendments 63 and 64 are the same as sections 9 and 10 of H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, increasing the amount any one person may deposit in a postal savings bank from $1,000 with interest and $1,000 without interest as provided under present law to $2,500 with interest. The provision as passed the House was for $3,000 with interest.

Amendment 64 permits the purchase of postal savings stamps in denominations of 10 cents to be affixed to a card and when it amounts to $1 may be deposited as a postal savings account or redeemed in cash.

On amendment 65: Amendment 65 is a clerical one made necessary by the addition of certain sections to the bill.

On amendment 23: Amendment 23 relates to the purchase of the pneumatic-tube mail service. The conferees have been unable to agree respecting the provisions of this amendment.

REHABILITATION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with the former order of the House, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 12212, commonly called a bill to provide for the vocational rehabilitation of wounded soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12212) to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military and naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Education to ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 4557, which passed the Senate a few days ago by unanimous vote, be substituted for the bill H. R. 12212.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, by authority of the Committee on Education, asks unanimous consent that the bill S. 4557, of similar tenor to the House bill, be substituted in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4557.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4557——

Mr. BANKHEAD. And, Mr. Speaker, pending the submission of that question, I want to couple with it the request that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and myself equally control the time when we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he control half of the time, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] the other half. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, might I ask the gentleman from Alabama about how much of general debate he thinks there will be on the measure to-morrow?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to that inquiry, Mr. Speaker, I will say that we have not agreed yet. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and other gentlemen of the committee and myself had a tentative agreement that it would be advisable, inasmuch as there would be a demand on the part of a good many Members, to place no limitation on the time for debate now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4557.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 7, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Engineer Department of the Army for the defenses of the Panama Canal, fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1149); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Thomas J. Lindley v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1150); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MONTAGUE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4445) granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 628), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4127) to authorize the W. M. Ritter Lumber Co., a corporation, to construct bridges across the branches and tributaries of the Big Sandy River and their tributaries, in the counties of Buchanan and Dickenson, in the State of Virginia, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 632), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

By Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11949) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Pearl River, Miss., and the fourth ward of the Parish of Washington, La., to construct a bridge across Pearl River, between Pearl River County, Miss., and Washington Parish, La., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 633), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11948) granting the consent of Congress to the Great Southern Lumber Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, doing business in the State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across Pearl River, at or near the north line of section 22, township 8 north, range 21 west, west of the basic meridian, in the land district east of Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 634), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. KEY of Ohio, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 4193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 629), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4542) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 630), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3798) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 631), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURNETT: A bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 12403) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," approved August 10, 1917; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BURNETT: A bill (H. R. 12404) authorizing the construction of a building for the Public Health Service in the city of Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BELL: Resolution (H. Res. 388) providing two messengers to telephone assistants; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. KING: Resolution (H. Res. 389) providing for the appointment of a committee of five Members of the House of Representatives to make a careful inquiry into the cost of cultivation and planting crops; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

By Mr. STEENERSON: Petition of William J. Dale and other citizens of Lockhart, Minn., against passage of House bill 128; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 7, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we consecrate a holy moment at the beginning of this session of the Senate that we may lift our hearts to Thee and seek Thy guidance and blessing. We desire amid the ever-increasing responsibilities of life to get our orders from Thy throne and receive our strength and wisdom from Thee. We desire that the people of this country who look for leadership in civil affairs to this body may realize that those who lead them are themselves led by the spirit of God. Grant us this day our grace to discharge our duties in the fear and in the sight of God. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LEWIS, under the permission granted to him yesterday, sent to the desk the following petitions, etc., for publication in the RECORD:

WOMAN'S CITY CLUB OF CHICAGO,
May 28, 1918.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed resolutions were unanimously passed at the regular meeting of the Woman's City Club, May 27, and the undersigned was instructed to send a copy to you, with the request that you have the same read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Thanking you for your consistent aid in this matter, I remain,
Very truly, yours,

AMELIA SEARS, Civic Director.

Whereas the members of the Woman's City Club of Chicago, through their civic activity, are hampered by limitation of their franchise and realize that the franchise in the hands of women means the development of a large group of citizens for civic righteousness; and

Whereas the women of the Nation have already shown their loyalty to the Government by their war work and other forms of service, the crisis of the world now demands that all their energies and activities be utilized for the good of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Woman's City Club of Chicago, wish to express our appreciation to you for your loyal support of the women of Illinois; we still urge you to continue your efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the Federal suffrage amendment.

MAY 27, 1918.

ILLINOIS EQUAL SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, May 21, 1918.

Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LEWIS: At a meeting at the headquarters of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association on Monday, May 20, representatives from the following organizations were present: Woman's Association of Commerce, Woman's Press Association, Woman's Protective Association, Chicago Political Equality League, Bindery Women's Union, Chicago Woman's Trade Union League, National Woman's Trade Union League, Woman's Defenders League, Daughters of 1918, Sixth Ward Civic League, Seventh Ward Civic League, Eighteenth Ward Civic League, Twenty-third Ward Civic League, and Twenty-fifth Ward Civic League.

The inclosed resolution was adopted, and we are sending it to you with the request that it be read into the record of the Senate. We are also inclosing the newspaper account of the meeting.

We feel sure that, because of your active interest in the work for full suffrage for our Illinois women, you will be interested.

Very cordially, yours.

HELEN STEWART,
Corresponding Secretary.

A conference was held at the headquarters of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association on Monday afternoon by members of the following organizations: Woman's Association of Commerce, Woman's Press Association, Woman's Protective Association, Chicago Political Equality League, Bindery Women's Union, Woman's Defenders League, Chicago Woman's Trade Union League, National Woman's Trade Union League, Daughters of 1918, Sixth Ward Civic League, Seventh Ward Civic League, Eighteenth Ward Civic League, Twenty-third Ward Civic League, and Twenty-fifth Ward Civic League. The following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas 40,000,000 women of the allied nations have been enfranchised since the war began; and

"Whereas we believe an American Republic will not deny its women the political liberty that monarchies have extended; and

"Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women to offset the votes of first-paper aliens, not loyal enough for the Army but permitted to vote; and

"Whereas the organized suffragists have already shown their loyalty to the Government by their war work, the crisis of the world now demands that all their energies be released from the struggle for their own political freedom: Therefore

"We urge the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment, and we express our appreciation of your loyal support and ask you to continue your efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the amendment."

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune, May 21, 1918.]

A conference was held at the headquarters of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association yesterday afternoon by members of the following organizations: Woman's Association of Commerce, Woman's Press Association, Woman's Protective Association, Chicago Political Equality League, Bindery Women's Union, Chicago Woman's Trade Union League, National Woman's Trade Union League, Woman's Defenders' League, Daughters of 1918, Sixth Ward Civic League, Seventh Ward Civic League, Eighteenth Ward Civic League, Twenty-third Ward Civic League, and Twenty-fifth Ward Civic League.

The following resolution was adopted and forwarded to the two Illinois Senators:

"Whereas 40,000,000 women of the allied nations have been enfranchised since the war began; and

"Whereas we believe an American Republic will not deny its women the political liberty that monarchies have extended; and

"Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women to offset the votes of first-paper aliens, not loyal enough for the Army but permitted to vote; and

"We urge the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment, and we express our appreciation of your loyal support and ask you to continue your efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the amendment."

[From the Chicago Evening Journal, May 21, 1918.]

ASK VOTE FOR LOYAL WOMEN TO OFFSET "FIRST PAPER" ALIENS.

Resolutions urging the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment immediately, so that the votes of loyal American women may be used to offset those of "first-paper" alien men were forwarded to United States Senators LEWIS and SHERMAN.

The resolutions were adopted by members of the following organizations, who met at the headquarters of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association: Woman's Association of Commerce, Woman's Press Association, Woman's Protective Association, Chicago Political Equality League, Bindery Women's Union, Chicago Woman's Trade Union League, National Woman's Trade Union League, Daughters of 1918, Sixth Ward Civic League, Seventh Ward Civic League, Eighteenth Ward Civic League, Twenty-third Ward Civic League, and Twenty-fifth Ward Civic League. The resolution:

"Whereas 40,000,000 women of the allied nations have been enfranchised since the war began; and

"Whereas we believe an American Republic will not deny its women the political liberty that monarchies have extended; and

"Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women to offset the votes of first-paper aliens, not loyal enough for the Army but permitted to vote; and

4117 CHAMPLAIN AVENUE,
May 21, 1918.

J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEWIS: I am inclosing to you a petition which the members of the Abraham Lincoln Center class in religion has prepared.

We would like to have this read into RECORD. The women of Illinois are proud that they have representing them in Congress two men who believe that justice and liberty should be extended to all regardless of sex.

They appreciate your standing and your efforts toward the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment.

Most cordially,

ELLA A. NAGELY.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN CENTER,
Chicago, May 21, 1918.

To the Members of the United States Senate now in session:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, members of the religious-study class at the Abraham Lincoln Center, Chicago, do respectfully join their petition with the ever-growing host of intelligent men and women in all countries for the prompt passage of the pending amendment to the Constitution, removing the sex limitation to the right of suffrage throughout the United States. Science, ethics, religion, and now the rapidly growing experience of many political units at home and abroad, all go to prove that in asking for the passage of this amendment we are simply asking for the obvious demands of reason, justice, and economic, social and political efficiency. To delay is to refuse a place in the advance line of civilization and to be found kicking against the pricks of destiny.

MATILDA C. SCHAFF
(And others).

DANVILLE, ILL.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: The undersigned have indorsed the following resolutions and request that they be read into the Senate RECORD.

"Whereas 40,000,000 women of the allied nations have been enfranchised since the war began; and

"Whereas we believe an American Republic will not deny its women the political liberty that monarchies have extended; and

"Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women to offset the votes of first-paper aliens, not loyal enough for the Army but permitted to vote; and

"Whereas even a brief analysis of America's part in this great war shows that next in sacrifice to the men on the firing line, in the air, on land, or on sea comes the women, mothers and wives and the great army of toilers in the many branches of war work so necessary to the success of our cause who are anxiously watching the action of the United States Senate for recognition, which they deserve; and

"Whereas the organized suffragists have already shown their loyalty to the Government by their war work, the crisis of the world now demands that all their energies be released from the struggle for the political freedom of our American women: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we urge the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment, and we express our appreciation of your loyal support and ask you to continue your efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the amendment."

DELAVAN, ILL., May 24, 1918.

Senator J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the Delavan Woman's Club, held May 22, the following resolution was unanimously passed by the 73 members present:

"Resolved, That the Delavan Woman's Club publicly express appreciation and thanks to Senators SHERMAN and LEWIS for the solid stand they have taken on Illinois equal suffrage, and the hope that their continued efforts may push the Federal amendment for full suffrage to a speedy passage."

Respectfully,

(Miss) ROSA TOMM,
(Miss) MARY ELLEN HAYES,
Mrs. J. T. NATIRESS,
Committee.

ALTON, ILL., May 22, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We are much interested in the passage of the Federal amendment. I am sending to you a copy of the resolutions passed by the Alton Equal Suffrage Association:

"Resolved, That the meeting called by the Alton Equal Suffrage Association on May 22 praises our two Senators, J. HAMILTON LEWIS and LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN, for standing solidly and consistently for suffrage; asks our Senators to use their utmost endeavor to secure a speedy passage of the Federal amendment; insists, as this war is a struggle for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government, that our Senators press the Federal amendment as a war measure; requests these resolutions or copies of editorials from Alton newspapers be read into the RECORD of the Senate."

The following is an editorial from the Alton Evening Telegraph:

"WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

"The Senate of the United States should pass the bill for full suffrage for women. We are lagging in the extension of this privilege to womankind. Other English-speaking nations have granted it, and why should not we? We are expecting the women to do their patriotic duties in war. We look to them to sacrifice their husbands and their sons and to help with the war work. They should have an equal voice in the voting on all matters submitted to a vote of the people. It is the modern thing to do, and the logical thing. The Senate should not delay the matter any longer. Votes for women is but fair."

I hope you will use all your influence to bring the Federal amendment to a successful vote.

Yours,

(Mrs. GEO. E.) ANNA J. WILKINSON.

WOMAN'S ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE OF
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Chicago, May 21, 1918.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the executive board of governors of the Woman's Association of Commerce of the United States of America held May 20, 1918, great interest was manifested in the present status of the Federal amendment. After discussion the following resolution was passed:

"Whereas 40,000,000 women of the allied nations have been enfranchised since the war began; and

"Whereas we believe an American Republic will not longer deny its women the political liberty that monarchies have extended; and

"Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women to offset the votes of first-paper aliens not loyal enough for the Army but permitted to vote; and

"Whereas the organized suffragists have already shown their loyalty to the Government by their war work, the crisis of the world now demands that all their energies be released from the struggle for their own political freedom: Therefore

"We urge the immediate passage of the Federal amendment, and we express our appreciation of your loyal support and ask you to continue your efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the amendment."

Yours, very truly,

WOMAN'S ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE
OF UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
FLORENCE KING, President.

FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS,
Freeport, Ill., May 28, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the last annual convention of the Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs of the thirteenth congressional district, representing 36 separate organizations, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the women of the United States have demonstrated their fitness and willingness to serve our country, no matter what the service; and

"Whereas now, more than ever before, the equal franchise is a necessity to insure the highest efficiency in the successful prosecution of the world war; and

"Whereas in the reconstructive period following in the wake of the war the equal enfranchisement of women and men is needed to reestablish industry, society, and a sane order of relationships: Be it

"Resolved, That this body recognizes the immediate passage of the Susan B. Anthony amendment to be an essential war measure and indorses the suffrage Federal amendment and protests against further delay in its passage by the Senate.

"Furthermore, we wish to express our approval of the support given this measure by the Senators of Illinois and request their further assistance for its safe passage.

CHICAGO WOMEN'S ATHLETIC CLUB,
Monmouth, Ill., May 24, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a joint meeting of the Monmouth Woman's Club and the Council of National Defense, which was largely attended by the most influential women of the town and county, resolutions were passed which voice the opinion of the women of this community on the passage of the so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution. The resolutions were passed by a unanimous vote.

The women of this city and community are very desirous of early passage of this amendment and any efforts that you may put forth will be greatly appreciated. I would also ask that this paper may be used in any way to aid toward that end. I was appointed to look after forwarding this to you. I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

Mrs. MARY E. SYKES,
Ex. County of Schools, Warren County, Ill.

MONMOUTH, ILL., May 20, 1918.

Whereas we, the members of the Monmouth Woman's Club and the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense, in joint meeting assembled, believe that the passage of the so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Federal Constitution should receive speedy action by the United States Senate; and

Whereas we believe that the passage of that amendment would prove a valuable war measure as declaring for a true democracy, giving to all the governed a voice in the Government; and

Whereas we believe that the opposition to said amendment comes from the enemies of liberty and justice, who through indifference, ignorance, or for selfish and evil purposes oppose the measure: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we do hereby express our sincere and heartfelt gratitude to the Congressmen from Illinois who so loyally and gallantly supported this amendment and to our Senators, who have so fearlessly declared their support of the measure, and would respectfully urge that they do all in their power to bring the vote in the Senate to a speedy and successful conclusion.

Mrs. ESTELLE P. HAMEL,
Secretary Monmouth Woman's Club.
Mrs. GEORGE F. MEACHAM,
Secretary Council National Defense.

DIXON WOMAN'S CLUB,
Dixon, May 26, 1918.

Senator LEWIS.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting yesterday of the Dixon Woman's Club resolutions to praise the efforts of our Senators who have stood solidly for full suffrage were adopted, at which we expressed confidence of a speedy passage.

Sincerely,

CORA L. PETERSBERGER,
Corresponding Secretary.

CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL., May 23, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Woman's Club of Chicago Heights heartily indorses the Susan B. Anthony amendment.

We protest against the undue delay of the passage of the amendment in the Senate and earnestly urge its passage.

Thanking you for firmly standing by our cause, I am,

Most respectfully, yours,

BELLE H. SMITH,
Corresponding Secretary.

WOMAN'S LEGISLATIVE CONGRESS,
May 29, 1918.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of a very large representative group of Illinois women I have the pleasure and honor to present the inclosed resolution.

It is not because of any need on your account that we present our petition, because we are aware of your loyalty to women, but to impress you with the fact that the suffrage amendment is our very great desire.

With appreciation,

Cordially, yours, (Mrs.) HARLAN WARD COOLEY,
Chairman.

Resolution.

Whereas the women of Illinois as partial citizens have been a great force for public good; and

Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women and good to offset the votes of first-paper aliens not loyal enough for service in the Army and Navy but permitted to vote; and

Whereas the women of the Nation have already shown their loyalty to the Government by their war work and other forms of service, the crisis of the world now demands that all their energies and activities be utilized for the good of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Members of the Illinois Woman's Legislative Congress, That in extending our appreciation to you, our representative in the United States Senate, for your loyal support of the women of Illinois, we further urge you to continue your best efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the Federal suffrage amendment.

WOMAN'S COMMITTEE, COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE, ILLINOIS DIVISION, CHICAGO.

Whereas since the world war began nine great States and nations have extended suffrage to their women, realizing the absolute necessity for such action to procure a maximum efficiency of the people for the successful prosecution of the war; and

Whereas the women of the United States of America are mobilizing for war service and stand ready to enter all the activities of the land, and are even now shouldering a great part of the burden in the Nation's hour of need; and

Whereas the women of the United States of America are equally well qualified as are the women of other nations to direct and hold the reins of government: Be it

Resolved, That the Galena Unit, Woman's Committee, Council of National Defense, declares the Susan B. Anthony amendment a war measure of the first importance and protests against the further delay in the Senate of carrying this measure through successfully.

(Signed) MYRTLE RENWICK HEER,
Chairman Galena Unit, Representing 32 Organizations.

CHICAGO WOMAN'S CLUB.

Whereas the time has passed when the United States Senate should fail to respond to the need of our country in this war-time stress to grant to women the full rights of citizenship, which experience in many States has demonstrated to be to the best interests of democracy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge the Senate of the United States to at once pass the Federal suffrage amendment, that the women of the United States may in every way possible take the places of our fast depleting ranks of male citizens; that thus armed with the ballot they may maintain democracy at home.

CHICAGO WOMAN'S CLUB,
May 24, 1918.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
Senator from Illinois, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find copy of resolution which the Chicago Woman's Club sent to-day to the Chairman of the Senate.

Thanking you for the efforts which you have already made in behalf of this measure, and confiding in you further most valuable support, I am,

Very truly, yours, ALICE E. MORAN,
Corresponding Secretary.

ENGLEWOOD WOMAN'S CLUB,
Chicago, May 23, 1918.

Hon. J. H. LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEWIS: We have watched with great interest your work upon the suffrage bill and have been very proud of your record.

Standing for full suffrage, Great Britain and Canada have enfranchised their women, and America must recognize and honor her women by granting them full suffrage.

We are sure you will continue your efforts to push the resolution to a speedy passage. We would like to have Illinois lead in recognizing the value of woman in the Nation. Thanking you most heartily, we are,

Very cordially, yours,

MYRTLE DEAN CLARK,
President.
RUTH O. REEVES,
Corresponding Secretary.

NATIONAL WOMAN'S PARTY,
May 29, 1918.

Hon. JAS. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am sending you the inclosed clipping from the Philadelphia Public Ledger, thinking it may be of interest to you in connection with the national suffrage amendment now pending in the Senate. This is the second strong editorial on the same subject which has appeared in this paper within the last 10 days. I hope you will give it your very serious attention.

Very truly, yours, ELLA RIEGEL,
Pennsylvania Member of the National Advisory Council.

ARE WOMEN PEOPLE, SENATORS?

Equal suffrage for men and women in all the States of the Union may be delayed, but it can not permanently be sidetracked. It is an act of justice that ought not to be delayed, because so long as any portion of the country denies to its women a voice in the management of public affairs our professions of devotion to the cause of democracy are made hollow and insincere, and we stand convicted before the world not only of inconsistency but we are pilloried as laggards in the march of progress. Shall it be said that the United States of America as a whole still hesitates about a step which has already been taken by nearly a third of the States and which has been adopted by Great Britain in double recognition of the justice of the women's demand and of the debt which the Empire owes to its women for their part in defending the liberty of the world against the deadly menace of Hun oppression?

The Senate of the United States is to be asked to-day to fulfill its too-long-delayed duty by passing on the Federal suffrage amendment, and the country looks to it to arrange itself upon the side of progress and of justice, not among the blind and stubborn forces of reaction. This measure has been held up upon the Senate calendar because of doubt whether there could be mustered a sufficient number of affirmative votes among those Senators who are alive to the overwhelming sentiment of the Nation in favor of a prompt settlement of the suffrage question and its removal from the field of controversy. It can no longer be said, since the verdict of New York State, that "women are people," that the issue is being forced upon the country by a handful of sparsely settled western Commonwealths. It is in truth being forced upon the Nation, but solely by the logic of events and by the irresistible influence of that sense of right and justice which should ultimately prevail in a true democracy.

This Nation is calling upon the women to make the supreme sacrifice of personal service as well as that vicarious sacrifice of their nearest and best for the cause of that civilization of which they are a vital part. The opposition of the enfranchisement of woman has degenerated into a blind refusal to accept the unanswerable logic of events, an obstinate determination to resist the inevitable, be it ever so just and reasonable. Their are politicians who stand in the way because they fear the influence of woman at the polls, a fear that is both a confession and a self-condemnation. There are subtle forces of evil which hope by defeating or delaying votes for woman to gain a stay for themselves and to avert their certain destruction. These are the elements still at work in the Senate to prevent the passage of the pending amendment, but they should be powerless before the power of a public opinion which has long since decided the issue of votes for women in the affirmative. Should not the Senate therefore keep abreast of the times rather than become the last refuge of reaction and blind injustice?

WOMAN'S PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., May 23, 1918.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We are inclosing herewith resolutions adopted by the Woman's Protective Association of Chicago, Ill. We ask your earnest support of the Federal suffrage amendment, which is on the calendar for an early vote.

Thanking you for your endeavors in behalf of the women of the State of Illinois, we are,

Yours, very truly,

WOMAN'S PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION,
By ELIZABETH L. HOFFMAN,
Corresponding Secretary.
MARGARET B. DOBYNE, President.

Resolution.

Whereas the members of the Woman's Protective Association, though not active in suffrage or political propaganda, realize that the franchise in the hands of women means the development of a large group of citizens for civic righteousness; and

Whereas our country needs the votes of loyal women to offset the votes of first-paper aliens, not loyal enough for service in the Army and Navy, but permitted to vote; and

Whereas the women of the Nation have already shown their loyalty to the Government by their war work and other forms of service, the crisis of the world now demands that all their energies and activities be utilized for the good of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Woman's Protective Association, wish to express our appreciation to you for your loyal support of the women of Illinois; we still urge you to continue your efforts in behalf of the speedy passage of the Federal suffrage amendment.

CHICAGO EQUAL SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS.

MY DEAR SIR: The amendment to the Federal Constitution enfranchising women is now pending in the Senate and we are confronted by a very serious situation.

We suffragists have, as you know, since the war began, put literally all our time and strength into war work. The roster of the Councils of Defense, State and national, is a list of our most active women, and I do not know one member of a suffrage organization who is not working hard at some form of service for her country. We would have rendered the service no matter what it cost, but we felt justified in hoping that, as in Europe, where 40,000,000 women of the allied nations have been enfranchised since the war began, our work for our country would speak for us louder than any organized suffrage propaganda.

But the Senate is now being flooded with demands that the matter be indefinitely postponed, "as the women and the country have lost interest and don't want it." It would be a tragedy if they had their way. You need the votes of the loyal women to offset the votes—allowed in many States—of the "first-paper" alien, not loyal enough for the Army but permitted to vote. We need to feel that our democracy—fighting for democracy—is at least as fair as the monarchies of Europe. The matter will come up in another week; the wavering ones must feel that the country does care. All political parties, either in their platform or by action of their central committee, have indorsed the Federal amendment. Suffrage is inevitable; why delay action any longer?

We appreciate the stand you and Senator SHERMAN have always taken for suffrage and urge that you use all your influence to get the amendment passed as quickly as possible.

You know the German newspapers did not print the news that England had enfranchised 2,000,000 men and 6,000,000 women. What Germany fears most is a real democracy. Witness her refusal to even consider woman suffrage and her defeat of the franchise extension bill. Where does the Senate stand?

DEAR SENATOR LEWIS: We appreciate the earnest work you have already done for suffrage and believe that it is speaking more and more clearly the mind and heart of the people. We do not believe a bit less in the great primary responsibility of woman in the home, but we believe that she has her right to assert herself as well in the matters of the Nation, and surely she is doing it and should be recognized with the franchise.

Mr. HOLLIS presented petitions of the New Hampshire Equal Suffrage Association, of Portsmouth, of sundry citizens of Portsmouth, and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Portsmouth, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jackson, Mich., praying for the passage of the Barkley war prohibition bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Third District of Federated Women's Clubs, of Hastings, Mich., praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Good Thunder, Minn., and a petition of sundry citizens of Mankato, Minn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4597) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 484) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10021) granting the consent of Congress to the county commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 485) thereon.

Mr. HOLLIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 4548) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia and to establish a minimum wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes, reported it with amendment and submitted a report (No. 486) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon:

A bill (S. 640) for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 489);

A bill (S. 3077) for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 487); and

A bill (S. 3993) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and to provide penalties for violation of this act (Rept. No. 488).

Mr. HOLLIS. As these three bills have been replaced by other bills of a similar character, I move that they be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Pursuant to Senate resolution No. 233, directing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the reasons for the irregular delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to addresses outside the District of Columbia, etc., I submit a report (No. 490), and ask that it be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Rept. No. 490, 65th Cong., 2d sess.]

DELIVERY AND ADDRESSING OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report, to accompany Senate resolution 233:

The Committee on Printing, pursuant to a resolution directing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the reasons for the irregular delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to addresses outside the District of Columbia, etc., has inquired into the addressing and delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and submits its report herewith:

The resolution (S. Res. 233) is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Printing is hereby directed to inquire into the reasons for the irregular delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to addresses outside of the District of Columbia, and also as to what improvements may be adopted that will make more legible the mailing addresses placed on the wrappers."

In its investigation the committee requested the Public Printer to submit a full statement concerning the delivery and addressing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Public Printer's report to the committee, under date of May 4, 1918, is submitted herewith:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, May 4, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In answer to yours under date of May 2, 1918, requesting a full statement in regard to the resolution of Senator GALLINGER, directing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the reasons for the irregular delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to addresses outside of the District of Columbia, and also to what improvements may be adopted that will make more legible the mailing addresses placed on wrappers, the following is respectfully submitted:

Shortage of stock has been the cause of printing but 5,000 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from April 4 to April 13, both dates inclusive. This shortage has been caused in this office by sufficient stock having been ordered but not received, owing to railroad congestion and other causes over which this office has no control. As rapidly as stock was received, the full number of copies were completed and mailed.

Following are the RECORD numbers, date upon which but 5,000 copies were printed, and date when full number was printed:

RECORD 94, April 4, 5,000 copies; completed April 15.
RECORD 95, April 5, 5,000 copies; completed April 15.
RECORD 96, April 6, 5,000 copies; completed April 15.
RECORD 97, April 8, 5,000 copies; completed April 17.
RECORD 98, April 9, 5,000 copies; completed April 17.
RECORD 99, April 10, 5,000 copies; completed April 18.
RECORD 100, April 11, 5,000 copies; completed April 18.
RECORD 101, April 12, 5,000 copies; completed April 19.
RECORD 102, April 13, 5,000 copies; completed April 19.
RECORD 103, full amount printed.

You will recall, my dear Senator, correspondence upon this subject under date of February 5, 1918, and February 7, 1918, between the chairman of the Joint Committee and the Public Printer, which clearly sets forth the reasons for the curtailment of the RECORD.

As to the legibility of the addresses in mailing out the RECORD, the superintendent of documents, in charge of this work, reports as follows:

"Within the past 30 days the mailing list of addresses on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been changed from the old pin-point system to the typewriter system, which has proved very satisfactory. Since the change has been made no copies have been returned on account of illegible addresses. The typewriter stencils are plain and legible and are giving satisfaction."

Although congestion in railway transportation is delaying some of our shipments of paper, the extraordinary demands being made on this office are being satisfactorily met.

Respectfully submitted.

(Signed) CORNELIUS FORD,
Public Printer.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
United States Senate.

The Committee on Printing is of the opinion that, according to the foregoing statement of the Public Printer, the delivery and addressing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have been improved in a satisfactory manner.

MARSHAL OF WESTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 7796) to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan shall be at the rate of $4,000 a year.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (by request):

A bill (S. 4678) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4679) to provide for the disposition of abandoned lighthouse and life-saving stations; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4680) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Perry; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted an amendment relative to the age limit of men to be hereafter raised by draft between the ages of 18 and 45 years, both inclusive, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRANCE submitted an amendment proposing to authorize the President to further mobilize the Federal forces and to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. HARDWICK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 260), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CONSIDERATION OF TREATIES—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BORAH. I send to the desk a notice of a proposed amendment to the rules, which I ask to have read, printed, and lie on the table.

The Secretary read as follows:

I herewith and hereby give formal notice, in accordance with the spirit and letter of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate—which prescribes the method by which the rules may be suspended, modified, or amended—that I will on to-morrow, if the Senate shall be in session on that day, and if not, upon the next day upon which the Senate is in session, submit a resolution or motion for the amendment of paragraph 3 of Rule XXXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, as follows:

Strike out all of paragraph 3 of Rule XXXVI relating to proceedings relative to treaties and insert the following:

"That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session, unless four-fifths of the Members of the Senate by yea-and-nay vote shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken."

And while it may not be necessary to do so, I hereby give notice that I shall offer this amendment to the rules as an amendment to Senate resolution 235 now pending before the Senate.

WILLIAM E. BORAH.

JUNE 7, 1918.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONCRETE SHIPS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I request that the following documents may be printed together as a public document, namely, Construction of Concrete Ships, special report submitted to Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the Emergency Fleet Corporation; Senate Committee on Commerce Report on the Construction of Concrete Ships; letter from Benjamin A. Howes and the reply to that document by a letter from Roy H. Robinson. I ask that they may be printed in the order which I have mentioned, and that they be referred to the Committee on Printing with this request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Senate bill 1553, to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, has just been received from the other House with amendments. I ask that the amendments be laid before the Senate and that the Senate concur in them.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, which were read, as follows:

On page 3, after line 7, to strike out all down to and including "warrant," in line 19, and insert:

"SEC. 5. That any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall have power, without warrant, to arrest any person committing a violation of this act in his presence or view and to take such person immediately for examination or trial before an officer or court of competent jurisdiction; shall have power to execute any warrant or other process issued by an officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of the provisions of this act; and shall have authority, with a search warrant, to search any place. The several judges of the courts established under the laws of the United States and United States commissioners may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue warrants in all such cases."

On page 5, line 24, to strike out "City of Washington" and insert "District of Columbia."

On page 6, line 2, after "therewith," insert: ": Provided, That none of the sums herein appropriated shall be expended for the editing, publication, or distribution of any departmental daily, weekly, or monthly newspapers: Provided further, That no person who is subject to the draft for service in the Army or Navy shall be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of this act."

On page 6, after line 11, to insert:

"SEC. 12. That one of the objects of this act is to foster the breeding of migratory game birds on farms and preserves for the purpose of increasing the food supply."

On page 6, line 12, to strike out "12" and insert "13."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Before the amendments are considered I think we ought to have a quorum. They seem to be important amendments. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Beckham	Hollis	Nugent	Sutherland
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Swanson
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Thompson
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Tillman
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Ransdell	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Saulsbury	Underwood
Dillingham	King	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fall	Kirby	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lenroot	Sherman	Warren
Fletcher	McCumber	Shields	Watson
France	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Wilfley
Gronna	McNary	Smith, Md.
Gulon	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Hale	Myers	Smith, S. C.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is detained by illness.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness, and that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family. I wish also to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on concurring in the amendments made by the House to Senate bill 1553.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the amendment again read proposed by the House as a substitute for section 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the House amendment.

The amendment was again read by the Secretary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask the Senator in charge of the measure if he can state substantially the difference between the provision as passed by the Senate and the provision inserted by the House.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The easiest way to do that is merely to read the two provisions. They are very short. Section 5 of the bill as passed by the Senate reads:

SEC. 5. That employees of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall, with respect thereto, have the same powers as are conferred by law on marshals with respect to executing the laws of the United States. That any warrant necessary to the enforcement of the provisions of this act, or any regulation made thereunder, shall be issued by the several judges of the courts established under the laws of the United States, and the United States commissioners within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause for the issuance of such warrant.

In lieu of that was inserted what the Secretary has just read. There is no difference, as I see it, in the world except as to the issuance of a warrant by a court of competent jurisdiction or by the commissioner of the court before a search is made of the residence of anyone. In other cases, where it is in the view of the party where the depredation was committed, they can make the arrest immediately without a warrant.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator thinks there is not enough essential difference between the provision as it passed the Senate and the provision as it passed the House to justify going to conference for its consideration by conferees?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will answer the Senator that I have been in conference with those who have the matter in control, and they have conferred with the Canadians in the movement to prevent the destruction of migratory birds, and they think that the House provision is better than the Senate provision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I have not had an opportunity to examine it. I know the Senator has given it special attention, and I feel justified in taking his judgment in reference to the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I may be entirely in error, but I think I can see a very material difference between the amendment which has been adopted by the House and the original clause as it passed this body. In the original clause, as just read by the Senator having charge of the measure, the language conferred authority upon the representatives of the Secretary of Agriculture specially delegated such as is now exercised under the law by United States marshals. That language is stricken out and in lieu of it provision is made that any representative of the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the right, without warrant, without complaint, to arrest anyone who is charged with having violated any of the provisions of this act.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not so understand the amendment. As I understood the reading of it, he can only do it in cases where the offense was committed in his presence.

Mr. FALL. I was going on to comment on that.

Mr. NELSON. It is a well-known common law principle applied to criminal law that you can arrest a man if you catch him in the offense, if it is committed in your presence. In that case you have a right to arrest him without warrant, and you can bring him before the court immediately.

Mr. FALL. I understand the distinction, and if the Senator had not interrupted me I should have continued by stating that the provision is that he should have the authority to arrest for any violation of this act whatsoever, not operating under the law as applied by the court to a United States marshal, but he has the right to arrest for any violation committed in his presence or in his view. It is in the disjunctive, as I understand it.

Mr. President, of course, even in a criminal prosecution or with reference to violations of a criminal statute, the question of presence is always one of construction by the court, and the courts have allowed arrests to be made without warrant under certain circumstances where the offense was constructively in the presence of the officer. Now, this seeks to create an entirely new line of officers in the United States. I am not, I may say now, very thoroughly in accord with many of the provisions of the bill. I had an opportunity to express myself once heretofore and I now desire to express my dissent from various provisions, and my very strong dissent from this amendment. I shall not vote for it under any circumstances, I do not propose to hold it up or even to ask for the yeas and nays upon it, but personally I want to go on record as voting against this amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is much to be said in favor of the principle for which this bill stands. That there should be some protection afforded migratory birds I think all will concede. However, our own experiences and the history of legislation, not only in our Nation but in other civilized countries, furnish many examples of imprudent, unwise, and often dangerous and destructive legislation, animated by the highest motives. Legislation is often inspired by a fanaticism or an intolerant dogmatism, and some slight evil or unimportant wrong is exaggerated and magnified until its correction or eradication becomes the most important thing in the world. Frequently people become obsessed with the thought that unless some fancied evil is corrected destruction awaits the Government. Legislation presents a most interesting study in psychology, and it is a study profoundly interesting to ascertain the causes which have produced important as well as unimportant legislative enactments. Very much of legislation results from the whims and caprices and fads and idiosyncrasies and burning zeal and limitless enthusiasm of one or more individuals.

I have sometimes thought this bill was the result of some of the characteristics embraced within the statement just made. Frequently legislation is productive of greater evils than benefits, and a measure which may have an atom of merit may have pounds of evil. We often encounter individuals who are profoundly impressed with the fact that some industrial or economic or governmental policy should be changed, or that some evil should immediately be remedied. They see only the object to be attained. They utterly fail to comprehend how the accomplishment of their desire would perhaps injure the entire social or political fabric or dislocate industrial conditions. They fail to see that relationships and interrelationships exist not only in the material, but in what might be called the incorporeal, the psychic, and the moral world. Perceiving some unimportant defect in a mighty and beautiful structure, to remedy it they would become iconoclasts and destroy it.

I was not a Member of the Senate when the question considered in this bill was first brought to the attention of the Senate. I understand that it was elaborately discussed, its constitutionality challenged, and many reasons urged against its enactment. But if it be admitted that there are valid and substantial reasons for some legislation dealing with this subject, it must be conceded by all that there are grave objections to this bill.

It may be that the evils to be corrected outweigh the dangers which it creates. However, I am opposed to the bill, and particularly opposed to the amendment which constitutes a part of section 5 of the bill as it has come from the House. Primarily, my objection to this measure is grounded upon the distinctions which, under our form of government, exist between the Federal and the State Governments. My opinion that the Federal Government is making insidious attacks upon the sovereignty of the States, and the local self-government of the people within the States, I am sure is supported by incontrovertible evidence, and my apprehension as to the result of such attacks is not wholly unfounded.

Under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution—the provision respecting the establishment of post offices and post roads and its supposed national prerogatives—the Federal Government is enacting criminal statutes which relate to acts and conduct cognizable under the police powers of the State. I confess to a feeling of alarm when I witness the growing tendency to superimpose the Federal Government upon the States and the complacent manner in which the people submit to Federal control in matters which I conceive to be exclusively local and domestic. I appreciate the fact that any effort of mine to stem this tide of federalism will perhaps be without avail. The people are saturated with the thought that all power is with the National Government; that to make it strong in a national and international way in order that it may discharge the duties, responsibilities, and functions placed upon it by the Constitution it must be so powerful as to control purely domestic and local and State affairs. A strong, virile, sovereign State, powerful and beneficent in its authority in local concerns, by many is not desired. I am amazed at the attitude of intelligent people when attention is called to the fact that the Federal Government is one of delegated and enumerated powers, that it is a child of the States and not the creator of these sovereignties in which we live. They manifest the utmost indifference and indicate a desire for the exercise of additional authority over the States and the domestic government of the citizens of the States by the National Government. Constitutional limitations upon the power of the Federal Government are looked upon by many with impatience. If the Federal Government sees fit to lay its hand upon the State and to perform any of the functions or duties pertaining to the States or discharge any of the responsibilities which are involved in local self-government, there are those who affect to see no impropriety or wrong in such a course. Indeed, there are those who welcome national control even of the most unimportant and exclusively local concerns.

The founders of the Republic did not contemplate a Federal criminal code to reach the lives and conduct of the people. They understood what the police powers of the State were; that under this power which inheres in the States it was not only their prerogative but their duty to protect by such restraints and regulations as were deemed to be reasonable and proper the lives, health, comfort, and property of its citizens. Senators will remember the substance of the statement of the court in the famous License Cases, Fifth Howard. There the court states in effect that the police power is never more nor less than the power of government inherent in every sovereignty; that is to say, the power to govern men and things.

Mr. President, I want the States to govern "men and things," to assert their inherent power for the protection of the lives and property of the people, and to impose such necessary and proper restrictions as may be required to maintain law and order and insure progress. It will be remembered that Mr. Justice Story, in the early case of Prigg v. Penn (16 Pet., 539), says that the police power belongs to the States in virtue of their general sovereignty and has never been conceded to the United States, and furthermore that it extends over all subjects within their territorial limits.

It is the duty of the States to provide for the security and protection of the citizens of the State, to enact such Federal statutes as may be necessary to preserve order and protect life and property. The States should be vital, living organisms. Their functions should not be weakened and their legitimate sphere of activity impinged upon. It weakens the States, it leads to confusion, uncertainty, serious complications, and finally to conflicts in authority and jurisdiction. Where there are two sovereignties or States attempting to control the same individuals, to legislate upon the same or similar subjects, and to exercise the same or similar police power, a situation will arise that in the end will become a menace to the peace and welfare and ultimately to the liberties of the people. If the conflict in jurisdiction is persistent, it may lead to civil strife, and frequently it leads to an abdication by one of its undoubted rights and prerogatives, and to aggressions, usurpations, and tyrannies upon the part of the other.

And so I predict in the present temper of the times, and with the present lethargy of the people in asserting a proper individualism and maintaining the vigor and virtue and vitality of the States, that there will be further devitalization of the States and further submergence of their constitutional forms which will result in a further aggrandizement of the Federal Government and an intrusion by it into the activities and functions of the States and into the spirit and lives of the people. This legislation provides a criminal statute relating to the conduct of the people within the States, and is in accord with the view that the Federal Government should occupy the field committed by the people to the States, and that the former should legislate for the local and domestic affairs of the citizens of the States. I repeat that efforts are made to have the Federal Government perform the functions of the States and to discharge those duties, responsibilities, and activities which are exclusively within the power of a sovereign State.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We can not go any further than the Constitution contemplates, can we? Do I understand that the Senator's remarks are animadversions upon the Constitution for the latitude that it gives to the Federal Government, or does he claim that we are proceeding in violation of the Constitution?

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, I am not animadverting upon the Constitution because of the powers which it gives the Federal Government; I am entirely satisfied with the enumerated and delegated powers given to the Federal Government. What I am protesting against is the apparent determination of some Senators and of the country—at least, of a large part of the country—to permit, by the Federal Government, the usurpation of powers that never were delegated to it. It was not within——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me finish this sentence. It was not within the purpose of the founders of our Government that the Federal Government should exercise the police powers of the States; that there should be a code of criminal laws enacted by the Federal Government relating to the conduct of individuals in their local and in State affairs. There are no common-law Federal offenses, and the framers of the Constitution and the people who ratified it never intended that the States should be lifeless political organisms. The States had constitutions and criminal statutes, and dealt with the questions and problems belonging to free and enlightened Commonwealths. They delegated to the National Government certain powers for national purposes, and the authority conferred upon it can not be rightfully exercised to weaken or destroy its creators.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Utah claim that this proposed law would be invalid as being an infringement on the constitutional prerogatives of the States?

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, personally I think that this proposed law goes to the limit—indeed, goes beyond the limit—as to the powers of the Federal Government. It seems obvious that the exercise of the powers conferred by this bill not only would be oppressive, but, if the bill becomes a law and is enforced according to its letter and spirit, it will infringe upon the reserved rights of the States. Moreover, it will be regarded as a further precedent justifying additional legislation by Congress dealing with local and purely intrastate affairs.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should merely like to submit that it is utterly impossible for us to destroy the powers of the States, because the Constitution is superior to the laws of Congress; the laws of Congress can not set aside the Constitution; but I should like to add this thought merely for consideration in this connection: There ought to be, in my judgment, the utmost freedom on the part of the Federal Government in exercising those powers which are conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States. In my judgment it is not only the privilege of the Federal Government to exercise its powers, but if, in the judgment of Congress, when its attention is called to matters which need the remedies of legislation that are within the powers of Congress under the Constitution, it is its duty to exercise those powers to meet the needs of the time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall have no quarrel with my friend from Washington in his generalization in the broad formula which he has just announced—if I have correctly understood him—namely, that the powers which have been delegated to the Federal Government may be and upon proper occasions ought to be exercised by it—of course, we all accede to that proposition. But that is not the entire question here presented. We have before us a measure which effects local and State concerns, and a proposition to place the National Government within the forum of the States to execise some of the police powers of the States. I again repeat there is a feeling prevalent in the land that the Federal Government ought to impose itself upon the States and discharge the responsibilities which devolve upon States. This attitude manifests itself in a waning of the spirit of local self-government, which is the life of this Republic and the maintenance of which is essential to the perpetuity of free institutions. We frequently find in the legislation of Congress encroachments upon the reserved powers of the States. We are gradually undermining that love of local self-government, that devotion to the State which alone will preserve this dual form of government and preserve our domestic institutions as well as our National Government.

As stated, a bill containing similar provisions to this received the attention of the Senate at a former session, and its constitutional features were then elaborately discussed. The able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], when this particular bill was before the Senate a few months ago, opposed it in a vigorous and logical way. As I remember, he contended that it was an infringement upon the rights of the States and was an assertion by the Federal Government of power and authority which it could not rightfully exercise.

Mr. President, it would seem that the power to control wild birds and wild animals within the States belongs to the States, that the right to prescribe game laws is a prerogative of the States. When personal property is transported from one State to another it becomes subject to the State to which it is taken. It may there be taxed and the manner of its disposition is controlled by the laws of the State. If it is stolen the offender is prosecuted by the State under the State statutes. The power of the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution gives it no authority to go into the States and to control the property when it ceases to be impressed with the character of "interstate commerce."

Concede that Congress has the right to legislate with respect to migratory birds, certainly there must come a time with respect to such birds when they become subject to the State laws. To multiply the number of Federal criminal statutes, to flood the States with additional marshals and agents and petty officials and detectives and bureaucratic hirelings to harass and annoy the people and subject them to the inconveniences and indignities that this will inevitably produce, seems to me to be improper, unwise, and indefensible. Already the States are filled with Federal agents who are interested in enforcing criminal statutes relating to the local and domestic affairs and conduct of the people. It matters not that there are State laws and State courts and State officials to protect the lives and property of the people; we must enact a Federal criminal code relating to many of the same matters governing the lives and conduct and the local and domestic affairs of the people. It matters not that the States have laws relating to the killing of birds and the capture and shipping of the same, the Federal Government must superimpose itself upon the States and legislate upon the same subjects and prescribe further and additional pains and penalties.

But I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the constitutional aspects of the bill or, indeed, to discuss any features of the bill, but merely to protest against the strong and increasing tendencies to crowd out and overwhelm the sovereign States and reduce them to mere dependencies, or lifeless, formless, and needless attachments to or appendages of an all-powerful and omnipotent Federal Government.

I desire, however, before sitting down to call attention to a few words of section 5 of the House bill. This section is very objectionable to me and it seems to me must be obnoxious to all persons who have been reared under Anglo-Saxon institutions. The section provides that any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall have power, without warrant, to arrest any person committing a violation of this act in his presence or view and also—> shall have power to execute any warrant or other process issued by an officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place, other than a dwelling, if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto.

Mr. President, it is bad enough to constitute any petty official of the Department of Agriculture, any of the little supernumeraries of a despotic bureau, a peace official and empower him with a warrant to arrest a person whom he claims violates provisions of the bill in his presence or view; but it is a monstrous proposition to give to such bureaucratic employee authority, without any warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling, if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, and so forth. There is no restriction upon his discretion or authority; but without investigation, without warrant, without any process whatever, he may enter upon the premises of any person, either night or day, and search such premises other than a dwelling house. He may enter the farmer's stables, or granaries, or storehouse, or trespass upon his property; he may spy and search and seize, all without warrant or process. Mr. President, such a power to be conferred upon a Federal official, or any other official, can not be defended by any person who has partaken of the spirit of Anglo-Saxon freedom. Senators should remember the controversies in our own land in the colonial days; searches and seizures by the officers of the Crown provoked hostilities and homicides. They incensed the people against the Crown, and did much to alienate the colonists from the mother land. This bill will place within the States an army of intermeddling, petty officials. For years the National Government and its bureaus and departments have had swarms of agents and representatives clothed with a little brief authority, swollen with their importance, who have too often been despotic and oppressive, and brought the Government into contempt, and in some instances developed a spirit of bitterness and unrest. In the West the people know something of bureaucratic methods. They have suffered from federalism and rules and regulations which have been given the effect of criminal statutes, and have been harassed and annoyed and oppressed until their indignation has been aroused, and their condemnation of departments and bureaus and officials of the Government has been bitter and unrestrained.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] upon a number of occasions, when the question of the power of the Federal Government to search the homes and premises of citizens was under discussion, has voiced in very strong terms the dangers resulting therefrom, and the evils flowing from the abuse of the exercise of such power. I submit that it is dangerous, that it is autocratic, that it is an affront to the citizens of a State to have some petty representative of bureaucracy go from Washington into a State and into the homes of the people, and exercise the authority conferred by this bill.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Does not the Senator think that it would be certainly more consistent, if we are to proceed with legislation of this kind to carry out the treaty with Canada, that we should enact similar legislation with reference to other treaty obligations? For instance, we have a treaty with some great, proud country, under which the citizens of that country have guaranteed to them rights to acquire property, to reside in this country, and to enjoy school privileges and other privileges on a par with the citizens of other countries. Would it not be consistent for us to follow this legislation by enacting legislation that the United States marshal shall enforce such treaty provisions without warrant or without complaint being filed and without judicial procedure, or to go further even and provide that the officials or the employees of the Secretary of the Interior shall have authority, without complaint being made, to make arrests for violation by a State or by a citizen of the provisions of such a treaty?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has made a far better argument in the question which he has propounded than I have made in support of the contention which I am submitting to the Senate, and I can not supplement it. But I submit for the consideration of the Senate that this provision is obnoxious to Anglo-Saxon ideas of government; it is obnoxious—or, at least, it ought to be—to the people of a sovereign State to have some member of a bureaucracy, some petty official of the Federal Government, come from Washington, thousands of miles away, and invade their premises without warrant. This bill authorizes him to make arrests without warrant, to search premises without process of the courts, and to subject the people to a sort of police surveillance that smacks of medievalism and of Spanish tyranny.

I shall vote against the House amendment, and it seems to me that the Senate ought to reject it. The original Senate bill was bad enough, but the House amendment is infinitely worse.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I did not anticipate that my motion to concur in the House amendment would bring about the amount of debate on the main question that has been precipitated. That question was debated in the Senate for three months——

Mr. GALLINGER. For even longer than that, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And, as my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, says, for even longer than that. Every item in it was gone over, to many of us to a degree that wore out one's patience. I have no contention with Senators for the position they occupy, but that position was answered by the vote of the Senate by something like 10 to 1 on the merits of the question as they were then discussed.

The only question before the Senate is whether or not the Senate is ready to concur in the House amendment, which, I think, and which those who will have in charge the execution of the law think, does not widen the power of the Federal Government at all but, in my opinion, gives a little added security against search. The House passed the bill yesterday with this amendment, which, I think, improves it; and, in order to avoid going to conference on this small amendment, I concluded that it would be best to ask the concurrence of the Senate in it.

While Senators are right in the statement of the broad principles which they have advocated and which are the breath, as we claim, of the democracy of our country, in the carrying out of the stipulations of this treaty we have agreed with Canada to do what we can to protect migratory birds. Hence, I have asked the concurrence of the Senate in the amendment of the House of Representatives, which, I repeat, in my opinion, improves rather than hurts the bill.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it is very true that this bill has been discussed upon principle; it is equally true that that principle was discussed before the formation of this Government and was recently discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States. For 140 years we have been discussing the principle which has been invoked by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and, in my judgment, it will yet be a few years before the discussion of that principle will cease. In the consideration of this measure there is involved not alone the discussion of this amendment but the discussion of the great principle of government upon which this Nation was founded.

Mr. President, I wish to say that foreign commentators upon the Constitution and the form of government of the United States are recognized as having written better than any American has ever written. Every one of them, from Bryce to Von Holst, and the most recent Italian teacher of jurisprudence, in discussing the form of government of the United States has held, without exception, that the perpetuity of this Government, as compared with any other democracy, depends upon this principle and upon this principle alone, the check upon bureaucracy and centralization of the State governments and the maintenance of State rights. Every move that is being made here, sir, is to strike down that doctrine and to put this country upon the plane of a pure democracy, although every government of that character which has existed upon the earth has passed through its little cycle and gone down to nothingness.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the original migratory-bird bill was of itself a very great stretch of authority, but I was disposed to let it go without the undue consumption of the time of this body. It is like everything else, however, just as soon as the end of the wedge is placed in position there is always an abundance of authority to hit the head of the wedge and drive it further. Not content with the original act as it passed the Senate, a further invasion of local power has been sought, until it is manifested in the amendment presented and adopted in the other House.

Here is one provision that, to my mind, is so utterly obnoxious that if my vote were to destroy the whole of the migratory-bird act I would destroy it rather than have this one provision in it and let the migratory birds take care of themselves, both here and in Canada. This amendment provides, on pages 3 and 4, in section 5:

That any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act—shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling, if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto.

The latter part contains a most obnoxious provision. Any regulation made by any authority charged with the execution of the migratory-bird act is to be made cause for arrest by some authority from the Department of Agriculture. I am not prepared to permit criminal legislation to be enacted by the Secretary of Agriculture. That is what this is. This amendment is practically nothing else. The Secretary of Agriculture—of whose department I have made some remarks and of whom I expect to make some more if my life is spared for a reasonable length of time—is not the department first of all that I propose to vest with the power of criminal legislation. Under this bill he can authorize any petty minion of his to come into my territory or on my private premises and with a warrant into my house or without a warrant to enter any outbuilding or any premises I have and search it from garret to foundation. I do not propose to let go unrebuked such a challenge of local right as that, not for a moment, and before the limitation is placed on the Senate of an hour's time on any bill or 20 minutes on any amendment I propose, once for all, to take such time as I please in this body to make necessary comments upon such an invasion and such an abuse of power as that contained in this House amendment.

I suppose this is another measure that is brought in under the guise of a war measure. We have had a good many of these changes. I am quite sure, Mr. President, that it will require more help to make these arrests than the Department of Agriculture now has. It is found, I suppose, at present, that it is impracticable to enforce this act with the present constabulary that the Government has. The marshals and deputy marshals, being occupied under the espionage act and the variety of duties that has been thrown upon them by the present conditions, have found that further help is required; and it is proposed to authorize for these purposes the employees of the Department of Agriculture. Now, these men, petty employees, representatives of bureaus, are to come upon private premises without a search warrant, and there seize anything, from a last year's bird's nest to a migratory duck that crossed the line.

I have seen a great deal of unwise legislation. I have seen some that is foolish, and much that is unnecessary, in State and Federal bodies; but to my mind this is the most thoroughly unnecessary and unwise, not to say imprudent in its invasion of State authority, of all the measures I have seen brought into this body. It is utterly unnecessary. It requires more help, more peace officers, more employees in the Department of Agriculture to enforce it than it would to conduct the ordinary judicial procedure and serve ordinary process in any of the Federal districts of the country.

The employee of the Department of Agriculture, without a warrant, can be made a roving commissioner to go about over the country, anywhere in the United States, for that matter, because he is not limited by districts except when he reports for punishment. He can go upon any premises, upon any outbuilding, upon any barn, anything connected with a dwelling house that is not a dwelling house itself, break locks and doors, and enter into a search for birds or birds' eggs, or for anything that crosses the line in the nature of a migratory feathered animal. He may search for the nests and birds' eggs, and for the birds themselves dead or alive, in cages or out of them. He may, because of this power vested in him by the amendment, turn himself into a roving authority to arrest, without warrant, upon his mere idea of whether it ought to be done or not, anybody, of either sex and any age. In addition to that, he is given authority to search any dwelling with a warrant, the issue of which is loose and informal. He can go before a United States commissioner anywhere in the United States where he happens to be, make the necessary oath, describe in an affidavit the premises he wishes to search, and say that there are two nests of some migratory bird, a plover or a quail that has come across the line, and under that sort of an affidavit he can have the warrant issued and make the search and come into the dwelling house of anybody in the country. It seems to me that this is using Federal authority for a small and insignificant purpose, and is making so trivial and ridiculous the authority of the United States that it savors of comedy rather than sober legislation.

I agree with some of my colleagues here on the police powers of the States. I know that now there seems to be a general drift toward a destruction of those powers. I shall adhere to my own convictions on that subject.

I voted here some days ago for the profiteering resolution on the rent subject. That applies entirely to the District of Columbia. It invokes a power that is inherent in that exercised in the acts on moratorium. They have been universally recognized. We could suspend all over the country, whenever suit is brought in a Federal court, every statute of limitations known to Federal practice; and they ordinarily adopt the limitations of the different States in which the suits are brought in which those different Federal districts are found. That I could justify. This I can not. The House amendment is an invasion of the most obnoxious type of a purely police power of a State.

Federal courts have decided, and decided many times, both the trial courts in the districts and the Supreme Court; that the game and the fish, when they once come inside the borders of a State, are subject to the police powers of the State only. They are owned by and the title to them, living or dead, is in the State. The Government then has no jurisdiction over them. When the migratory birds come inside the borders of Maryland, or when a fish leaves the sea and comes up the arm of a river until it reaches Maryland territory, and passes inside the border, both the fowl and the fish thereafter become a part of the common property of the State of Maryland. The fish and game are a part of the property of the State of Maryland, owned in common, and subject only within that State to the acts of the Legislature of Maryland. When the courts shall have reached the point of expounding and applying the acts in relation to migratory birds that we have passed here in considerable profusion in the last two or three years, they will announce that doctrine. It is well known, and has been known from the beginning. The fish that leaves the sea and comes inside the borders of a State, after it passes the line, is within the power of the State and is the common property of the State, just like common pasturage used to be when the land was common. The fish and the fowl are exactly in the same position. When the fowl, winging its way in the air, comes over the border and gets within the borders of the State, it is a part of the State property. The State legislature can control, through its police powers, the actions of its citizens upon the fish and game inside of that State. What we may do by treaty to modify the power of the legislature over its own fish and game is an undecided question. Just what this treaty between this country and Canada will do is uncertain. A treaty is a law of the United States and is sometimes of much more binding authority than an act of Congress. This is one of the police powers that is ordinarily not of much significance, and if it were not for the precedent involved in the House amendment, I would simply content myself with voting against it, but because of the insidious character of a number of those amendments, all of whose purposes are to invade these provinces of the States that have been from the beginning reserved exclusively for the action of the States, I felt disposed to voice my protest more at length. For that reason, Mr. President, I have taken this occasion to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the House amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very heartily in favor of this legislation and have supported it at all stages. I have nothing to say about section 5. Powers of the kind must be given. But another amendment that does not seem to have been noticed is as follows:

Provided, That none of the sums herein appropriated shall be expended for the editing, publication, or distribution of any departmental daily, weekly, or monthly newspapers.

I am entirely in favor of putting that restriction on the expenditures of the money, but the departments do not publish newspapers. It ought to be properly worded.

Then there is another amendment:

That one of the objects of this act is to foster the breeding of migratory game birds.

That is not statutory language or the ordinary way of legislating. A statute is supposed to explain itself; and to put in "one of the objects of this act is to foster the breeding of migratory game birds on farms and preserves for the purpose of increasing the food supply"—no doubt that is an object of the act; no doubt it will have that effect if properly administered; but surely that is not the way to frame a statute. It seems to me that it ought to go back to conference.

I have no objection to the amendments, but I think they ought to be properly worded and put in suitable legislative language.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have had some experience with this bill. It was debated from four to six months, it strikes me, in one House or the other—principally in this. I do not see any necessity for the statement in the bill to which the Senator from Massachusetts has made objection. I do not see any harm in it, unless some might feel that a sort of an assault would be made on Congress for the lack of a proper use of phraseology. I did not care whether or not it said "that the object of this act is to foster the breeding of migratory game birds on farms," and so forth. The act itself would settle that question, whatever Congress may declare about it.

At the suggestion of those who think that these minor matters ought to be corrected I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments and request a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona withdraws his motion to concur in the amendments of the House and moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOSTILE SUBMARINES ON AMERICAN COAST.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I was not in the Senate yesterday when the matter of the submarine attacks on the Atlantic coast was up for discussion. I am glad to see in the RECORD this morning that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and others defended the Navy. It seemed to me this morning that it might be well to get an authoritative statement from the Navy Department. I wrote the Secretary of the Navy a letter and received the following answer:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 7, 1918.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR TILLMAN: After conference with Admiral Benson and other naval officers, it has been agreed that at this time it would be exceedingly unwise to give out any information which could be used to advantage by the enemy.

Submarine hunting is at best a most elusive thing. Be assured that everything that can be done is being done. All naval units are disposed in manner dictated by experience and study of the subject.

If you felt disposed to state that you are assured that all possible steps are being taken and have been taken, but that to give the information might be of advantage to the enemy, I believe it would be the wisest thing to do at this time.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. President, that is just what I am trying to do. I have been assured by the proper naval authorities, as this letter shows, that everything that can be done is being done. As chairman of the Naval Committee I want to assure those who are panic-stricken that there is no need for panic at all, for we have a Navy that is "up to snuff." It can take care of our cities and everything else, and it will hunt down these damned devils and wipe them off the face of the earth, so everybody can sleep in peace.

LANDS IN BLACKFEET RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, at the request of my colleague [Mr. WALSH], who is necessarily absent, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4404. I will say by way of explanation that it is a bill for opening a part of the Blackfeet Reservation and for allotting the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in Montana. A similar bill passed the Senate once before, and, I think, twice. It is in substantially the same form. I am told it was unanimously recommended by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Bureau and by the Indians themselves, and that it is satisfactory to everybody. It carries no appropriation. My colleague, who is the author of the bill, is very anxious to have it passed by the Senate and to get it on its way to the other branch of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4404) repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., 1015–1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation in Montana, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs were, in section 1, page 2, line 3, before the word "Indians," to strike out "living"; in line 4, after the word "allotted," to insert "living six months after the approval of this act"; in line 6, before the word "Indians," to strike out "living" and insert "the"; in line 10, before the word "patent," to strike out "restricted" and insert "trust"; in line 12, after the word "direct," to insert "Provided further, That the Blackfeet tribal rolls shall close six months after the approval of this act, and thereafter no additional names shall be added to said rolls"; on page 3, line 11, after the word "direct," to insert "and patents hereafter issued shall contain a reservation accordingly"; and in line 21, after the word "mentioned," to strike out "And provided further, That lands classified as mineral or valuable for coal or other minerals may be allotted, with a reservation, however, in any patent of the coal, oil, or gas, or other mineral deposits for the benefit of the said tribe," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pp. 1015 and 1035), as relates to the disposal of surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in Montana, is hereby repealed, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make allotments under existing laws within the said reservation to any Indians of said Blackfeet Tribe not heretofore allotted, living six months after the approval of this act, and thereafter to prorate all unallotted and otherwise unreserved lands therein among the Indians who have been allotted or may be entitled to rights within said reservation: Provided, That of the lands so allotted 80 acres of each allotment shall be designated as a homestead by the allottee and be evidenced by a trust patent and shall remain inalienable until Congress shall otherwise direct: Provided further, That the Blackfeet tribal rolls shall close six months after the approval of this act and thereafter no additional names shall be added to said rolls.

SEC. 2. That nothing herein shall be construed to repeal the grants of land made by the act of March 1, 1907, to religious institutions and to the State of Montana for school purposes, nor repeal the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of any land within said reservation suitable for town-site purposes, as provided by that act: Provided, That the State of Montana in making indemnity school selections shall be confined to nonmineral and nonirrigable lands: Provided further, That the provisions of the act of March 1, 1907, which require a division of the funds received from the sale of the surplus lands immediately upon the date of the approval of the allotments of land are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That the lands within said reservation, whether allotted, unallotted, reserved, set aside for town-site purposes, granted to the State of Montana for school purposes, or otherwise disposed of, shall be subject to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country until otherwise provided by Congress.

SEC. 4. That any and all minerals, including coal, oil, and gas, are hereby reserved for the benefit of the Blackfeet Tribe of Indians until Congress shall otherwise direct, and patents hereafter issued shall contain a reservation accordingly: Provided, That the lands containing said minerals may be leased under such rules and regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided further, That allotments herein provided for shall be made under such rules and regulations as the said Secretary may prescribe, and trust patents shall be issued therefor as provided by the aforesaid act of March 1, 1907, except as to the homestead hereinbefore mentioned.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRODUCTION OF GASOLINE.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to call up Senate resolution 259, which I offered yesterday and which went over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 259, directing the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures to investigate the process discovered by S. M. Herber for extracting gasoline and other motor fuel from petroleum, including the denial of a patent to said Herber therefor, and report to the Senate, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXHIBITS FOR BRONX EXPOSITION OF NEW YORK.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to take up the bill (S. 4108) to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at expositions of the arts, sciences, and industries and products of the soil, mine, and sea, to be held in international expositions in 1918 and in each successive following year by the Bronx Exposition (Inc.), of New York, in the buildings in the city of New York owned or controlled by the said Bronx Exposition (Inc.), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of the payment of such duty, customs, fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition in any of the said years to sell, for delivery at the close thereof, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the authority hereby granted shall be deemed to apply also to all articles upon which no duty has been paid, now held in bond, and heretofore imported under authority of law for exhibition at any exposition heretofore held within the United States which said articles may be transferred under like regulations to said building owned or controlled by the said Bronx Exposition (Inc.): Provided further, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and on articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use; and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal: And provided further, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed as an invitation, express or implied, from the Government of the United States to any foreign Government, State, municipality, corporation, partnership, or individual to import any such articles for the purpose of exhibition at the said exposition.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINERALS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona if he expects to pass that bill this morning by 2 o'clock?

Mr. ASHURST. The rainstorm is so furious outside that I am unable to hear the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The unfinished business will come before the Senate at 2 o'clock, and I feel quite sure the Senator can not pass the bill in the three-quarters of an hour that remain. I ask the Senator if he will not let it go over to-day?

Mr. ASHURST. Of course if it will be a personal accommodation or favor to the Senator from Utah, I certainly will not make the motion; but I think I would better make a short statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course there is no objection to that.

Mr. ASHURST. The bill provides for the opening of Indian reservations to metalliferous mining. There are several millions of acres of land belonging to the various Indian tribes which contain metals now very much needed by our Government owing to the exigencies of the war. A similar bill passed the House of Representatives in the last Congress, and it was favorably reported to the Senate from the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. The Sixty-fourth Congress, however, came to a close and the bill did not become a law owing to the inability to reach the same, the calendar being very congested. The bill as it passed the House and as reported to the Senate was again introduced by myself in the Senate at this Congress, and it has been reported favorably from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I now read a short extract from the report of the committee on this bill:

The following table shows the area of unallotted lands included within Indian reservations in the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast States which will be opened to prospecting for gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals in the event that this bill becomes a law:

Area of unallotted land in Indian reservations.

	Acres.
Arizona	19,551,045
California	436,211
Colorado	375,960
Idaho	55,453
Montana	4,313,416
Nevada	687,912
New Mexico	1,889,880
Oregon	1,208,469
Utah	506,880
Washington	3,150,075
Wyoming	608,526

The Secretary of the Interior in his report to the Indian Affairs Committees of the Senate and House on this bill urged the passage of the bill with certain amendments, which have been adopted by the committees.

I here read a further extract from the favorable report of the Senate committee on this bill:

It is well known that many of the reservations in the Western States contain large and valuable deposits of minerals, but in the absence of suitable legislation there has been no development of these resources. The Indians have not engaged in mining because they do not possess either the knowledge or the capital that is required to conduct extensive mining operations. It is the opinion of your committee that this bill offers a workable plan that will bring about development and which fully protects the interests of the Indians.

Mr. President, the Interior Department and the Bureau of Mines are exercising every faculty and energy within their power to increase our supply of certain metals required in the manufacture of munitions and explosives. Indeed, we recall that the ill-fated steamer Cyclops, supposed to have been sunk last March near the West Indies, carried a cargo of manganese ore from Brazil. That ship was bound for the United States laden with manganese ores, when in the mountains of the Indian reservations of my own State there are tons of manganese ores which could be mined and could be utilized quickly. The ships that are now transporting such ores from South America are necessary at this time and can be used for transporting flour, clothing, munitions, and soldiers to Europe. It seems to me that no far-seeing man could oppose legislation which would open vast quantities of these metals which are now so essential.

I will here read an excerpt from the Arizona Daily Gazette with reference to the necessity of mining our own metals, rather than sending ships all the long way to Brazil, Chile, and Peru for the very metals we have in abundance here; and let me call attention to the fact that the rare and the minor metals for the manufacture of explosives and ordnance are just as necessary as are the major metals. Indeed, as to platinum—which is found in some of the Indian reservations in great quantities—we are hard pressed in order to obtain the necessary supply. Why not, therefore, pass a bill, which is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and which has passed the House of Representatives, to take from the earth on our own shores these metals, major and minor? I read from the editorial, as follows:

OUR MINOR MINERALS.

Secretary of the Interior Lane recently offered a suggestion for increasing transport facilities. It is simply that the United States increase its own production of minor minerals and so release the many ships that must now be used to bring these minerals to us from distant lands—China, Ceylon, Chile, Spain, Australia, Greenland.

Mr. President, we are sending our ships to these far-away countries across the bounding main to get metals which we have in abundance here at home, because some Senators forsooth do not believe we should lease lands from the Indians for mining purposes; in other words, rather than give up their doctrine and philosophy that an Indian reservation should not be leased at all, Senators prefer that we send our ships all the way to Ceylon, to China, to Brazil, to bring home metals that we have here in great quantities. Again, reading from the editorial:

These minor minerals, chief among them being manganese, are essentials in the manufacture of steel for high-grade munitions, auto and airplane frames and armor-piercing projectiles and in making various explosives.

The United States has mines containing manganese, tungsten, chromite, nitrate, mercury, antimony, mica, and so on down the list. But they are small mines and have never been worked to their full capacity.

Mr. President, a large amount of the manganese ores and ores of the minor metals and the rare metals necessary in the manufacture of ordnance and explosives happen to be located on Indian reservations. This bill has been most closely scrutinized; it is so drawn that the interests of the Indians are fully preserved. A very liberal royalty—a royalty as liberal as any that could be suggested—is proposed to be paid to the Indian tribes. The rights of the Indians are well guarded; no land upon which there is a "water hole," no land upon which there is a spring which the Indians have ever used may be taken for the purpose of extracting these metals.

I urge that the Senate give favorable consideration to the bill. I have not heretofore pressed it, because other bills of importance—although this is also most important—has engaged the attention of the Senate.

I do not at this time seek to assail the views of those Senators who are opposed to the leasing system; but let me say, Mr. President, in all candor, that this bill, which proposes to mine metalliferous minerals upon Indian reservations does not in any essential respect impinge upon or oppose the philosophy or the views of those Senators who are opposed to the leasing of "public lands." It may be that Senators would oppose a landlord system with reference to our public lands, but Indian reservations are not "public lands." You can not make a homestead entry upon them; you can not make any kind of an entry upon lands belonging to Indian tribes. Such lands are held in trust by the Government for the benefit of the Indian tribes. Are we really benefiting the Indian tribes when a greater sum of money could now be obtained for the minerals than at any other time, if we do not enact legislation looking to that end? Why shall we not, therefore, proceed to extract the manganese and all the other minor and major metals as well instead of sending, I repeat, our ships to Ceylon, to Brazil, and to Peru in order to bring here ores which we have in abundance?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I was just wondering, as this legislation is entirely new, and I never heard of the bill until the Senator from Arizona mentioned it a moment ago, whether it would not be possible for the Government, through treaty or otherwise, to extinguish the title which the Indians have in the lands that are known to be mineral, and then, after such extinguishment, to permit the acquisition of title in fee by those who care to enter upon the lands and to mine and develop them?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, such an act could not be passed, and I will say to my learned friend from Utah that I am sure the Indian Committee would oppose such legislation. It would not be good faith toward the Indian. We have relegated the Indian to a reservation, and in many instances that reservation has been poor land; but it so happens, in the providence of the Almighty, some of the lands to which we have relegated the Indian and which we thought were very poor have turned out to be lands abounding in minerals. Since we have discovered that these lands which we thought were poor lands, upon which we have settled him, abound in minerals, it would not be good faith to say we are going to carve out of the Indian estate the rich part thereof and that they shall have the shell, the hull, the remainder. I do not believe that would be acting in entire good faith toward the Indian.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I do not want the Senator from Arizona to get the idea from the question which I propounded that I had any intention to deal unfairly or, indeed, ungenerously with the Indians. My idea was that, if the lands could be purchased from the Indians, then the mining operations could be prosecuted, certainly with greater celerity and with greater success by private enterprise than under the leasing system.

Mr. ASHURST. First let me make myself clear. The Senator from Utah is a valued member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. If aught I said would seem to indicate any thought that he would favor a proposition which would appear to be in bad faith, I must withdraw such remark. The Senator gave careful and intelligent attention to matters before the committee, and his suggestions were valuable to our committee. I simply meant to say emphatically that I did not think such a policy could be adopted. I think the only practical way—and this is a practical world—in which we can treat this proposition is to lease the land; let the equitable title remain in the Indians, the legal title being held in trust by the Government for the Indians, the Indians getting a royalty on the minerals which are extracted.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was going to make a suggestion to my colleague in line with what the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said. I personally think that the policy suggested by the Senator from Utah would be wiser; but, as my colleague has said, this is a practical world, and we know that the Indians' Rights Association and those hedging around and taking such good care of the Indians always are able to bring power to bear to prevent us using proper and practical intelligence in handling either the Indian himself or the land he owns. So this consideration led me to support, as it did many of us, the most practical measure that could be gotten out of the situation. My colleague knows that what we want done can not be done. We need these ores, and we have got to adopt the best possible means we can adopt to get them. I join him in the hope that the Senate will pass this bill just as soon as possible, for I think, if I am not intruding——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield cheerfully.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I see my friend the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] evidences dissent from the suggestion I have made. I think I know the reason for his dissent, namely, that it would in a way establish a precedent for leasing the public lands. I wish to say that I would not consent to a proposition that extended the leasing system another inch; and if I believed with the Senator from Utah that this bill extended that system I would join with him in opposing its passage.

The ore being on lands embraced in Indian reservations dedicated to the Indian, the United States still having the control and power over him and the reservations, it seems to me that we might make such disposition of the lands, whether we call it a lease or call it a permit—we do not need to use the word "lease"—as to obtain this very necessary ore without establishing the precedent that the Senator from Utah and myself equally deprecate at all times.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I only wish to ask the Senator if I understood him to say that there were large quantities of manganese ore in the lands to which he has referred?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; manganese ore.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not examined the bill with any care, but I wish to say that there is nothing that we need so much at this time as manganese.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite true.

Mr. LODGE. We are dependent now on Brazil for a sufficient supply, and getting it is rather uncertain. Our own supply is very insufficient. Manganese ore is of vast importance; we need it more than anything else, and if there is any large quantity of manganese in this country that can be opened and put on the market no greater service could be rendered to the Government in connection with the manufacture of war munitions.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. Before he came into the Chamber I stated the fact, which, of course, he knows full well, that the steamer Cyclops, supposed to be lost coming from Brazil, was laden with manganese ore.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. Whereas we have large quantities of manganese ore within our own borders, large bodies of it being on Indian reservations.

This bill only proposes that the prospector or miner, willing to risk his time and his money, may have a lease from the Government to extract those ores, the Indian tribes getting a very substantial royalty. As it is now they receive nothing and we do not get the ore, and if we do not enact this legislation the war and its fury will roll on and on, the Indians will get nothing out of the ores on their lands, and we and our allies will get no manganese.

Mr. LODGE. If we have manganese ores there, we ought to find some method of getting them which would be just to the Indians; but at this time to leave unused manganese ores that are known to be in the earth is a misfortune to the country.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield first to my colleague and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that we are having some difficulty in connection with manganese ore because of freight rates. A man who is interested in what is thought to be a big manganese mine in Arizona who called at my office only a few days ago said that it has been found that in transporting it they are unable to get any kind of liberal freight rates, and that under the prevailing rates there has been added 15 cents a unit on purchases here in favor of the manganese from this side of Chicago. Why that is so, nobody knows; but it is retarding the men who are trying to bring manganese ore here, and in the meantime the Government is required to employ ships to bring manganese from distant countries of the world, and those ships from time to time are sunk.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that the manganese spoken of by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is located on public lands and not on Indian lands. There is plenty of manganese, if the reports are correct, in Arizona alone which could be made use of if the freight rates and conditions were such that the mines could be worked and the ore taken out.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator understands that I was not arguing in regard to the method to be employed in obtaining the ore; but I know that our country at this time is not of itself producing one-third of the manganese ore which it needs so sorely in all the great metal manufactures for war purposes. We ought to get that ore wherever it is. I do not know enough about the question to say whether freight rates are in the way of getting it, but we ought to arrange to get it.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator; and I wish to say now that if we had freight rates that would justify the shipping of manganese ore, it could be shipped from Arizona, it could be shipped from Colorado and from Utah, and there is no question in the world that there could be produced perhaps a sufficient amount for the requirements of the United States. It is not necessary to go on Indian reservations for it. The Senator from Arizona knows, or I think he knows, that in some parts of Arizona and in Utah manganese ore is mixed with other ores and can only be obtained in that form. The difficulty lies in the freight rates which the producer is compelled to pay to transport the ore to a smelter to get it separated. That is where the trouble is; it is not that there is no manganese ore in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. The Government now controls the railroads.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that, and it seems to me that that is the place we ought to go rather than try to pass laws that would authorize the leasing of Indian lands, when there is no earthly necessity for it, so far as manganese ore is concerned, because the public lands contain the identical ores that are contained in the lands which it is sought to have leased.

The Senator from Arizona knows also that private capital will not go to work and develop manganese ore or other ore upon the public lands when they can go onto other lands to-day without paying any royalty whatever. They are not going onto Indian lands and try to develop them, either.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, because I had yielded to him, and I want him to make a complete statement; but let me say, in respect to manganese ores in Arizona, that a large quantity of such ore is supposed to exist and is on a military reservation. I asked the Department of War to permit the exploration and mining of manganese ore, but the Secretary of War declined to give the necessary permits. So those ores are withdrawn from our use. The railroad freight rates, as my colleague and as the Senator from Utah have said, are so excessive that the ores can not be utilized which have been discovered on the public domain.

I happened to mention manganese ore because it came to my mind as a forceful illustration by reason of the sinking of the Cyclops, which carried such ores; but there are numerous other metals that are needed and are essential in the production and manufacture of ordnance and explosives.

This bill is being ground between the upper and the nether millstones. First, it is assailed in some quarters as being rather unfair to the Indian, and it is stated that under this bill his lands will be exploited. I say, in reply, that the bill is most carefully guarded; Indian lands can not be exploited. The Indian will get a splendid royalty for all the ore taken out, and the equitable title of the land will remain in the Indian, the legal title being held by the Government for him.

The other millstone is that some Senators and private citizens who belong to that school of thought are opposed to leases. Between these two millstones this bill makes no progress. Let me say to those Senators who are opposed to leasing that this bill does not contemplate the leasing of "public lands." I can well see how a Senator who earnestly opposes the leasing of public lands can vote for this bill, because the Indian reservations are not public lands, and we lease Indian reservations now for the purposes of raising cattle and sheep and carrying on agriculture of all kind.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. In other places we lease Indian lands for mineral purposes.

Mr. ASHURST. We do, indeed, for mineral purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if that is the case, why have a bill at all?

Mr. CURTIS. Because the leases which have been made heretofore are in Oklahoma, where special bills apply to the reservations, and cover asphalt, coal, oil, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. But they are the only ones that are leased. If this bill will be confined to oil, coal, and gas, the same as the Oklahoma leasing bill is confined, upon Indian reservations, I would not oppose it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, logical as he is and forceful in debate as he is, has admitted his case away.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment, now. If by any reason of logic or propriety you can lease Indian lands that contain coal and oil, why do you stop when it comes to leasing lands that are valuable in nitrates, manganese, or other metals?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has lived so long in a mining country that I am really surprised that he should ask that question. I suppose it would take too long for me to go into that subject now, but I just want to suggest this to the Senator: The Senator knows, I believe, that there are more dollars spent in prospecting for the precious metals than there are dollars taken out of the earth in that way.

Mr. ASHURST. I think that is the history of the mining industry.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say without question of doubt that if you take every Western State that there is and carefully keep track of the time and the expense to which the prospector is put from the time he starts until the mine is developed, if there is a mine—and there is only about one prospect out of a thousand that makes a mine—the cost will be more than is ever taken out of the ground of the precious metals.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that in the hearings we had upon the rare-metal bill there was one witness who testified that the estimates of the very best authorities were to the effect that $5 were expended for every dollar of net profit.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in my opinion it is less than $5, but I wanted to be within reason in making my statement.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me answer the Senator. Let us assume—and, indeed, what the Senator from Colorado has said is true, and what the Senator from Utah has said is true—how, in what way, can you conjure up an argument against this bill by reason of those facts? How does what you have just said become an argument against this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was talking about the question submitted to me by the Senator, and his statement that I had given my case away because I had admitted that perhaps there was some justification in leasing oil and coal and gas lands, as has been done on the Indian reservations in Oklahoma. Why, Mr. President, when coal is discovered they know the size of the vein, and they can follow it along the mountain for miles and miles. There is not any special risk of loss in mining coal.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me interrupt the Senator there. The initial expense, the equipment required to get ready to take out the coal, is usually greater than the preparation for working a gold mine.

Mr. SMOOT. That all depends on how deep the mine is and how extensively it is worked. I can take the Senator to a mine that costs two, four, five, six, or seven times the amount for the mining of copper and the mining of silver and the mining of gold that it would cost to prepare for the mining of coal. Again, Mr. President, the Senator, of course, knows positively that with coal you run no chance of loss after the mine has been opened up and developed. You know just how far you can go. You know what you can do. There is not a gold-mine operator in the world who knows 30 days ahead of the last shot put into a drift whether there will be gold for 10 feet ahead or not.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the mine should prove to be a misfortune to the investors, in what way could the Indians be harmed? The bold, aggressive, speculative man who puts his money into the mine might lose it, but the Indians have not been harmed. The individual citizen is willing to accept a lease. Why should he be denied the opportunity?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that he knows as well as every other Senator who has given the question attention that the people who are crowding on the Western States this leasing system are not only in favor of leasing all the lands that are left but in favor of compelling a lease upon every mine that produces lead, silver, copper, gold, or precious metals of any kind; and let me tell the Senator that if we begin to pass laws allowing the leasing of Indian lands for mining purposes, just as surely as he stands upon this floor now it will be carried to the extent of compelling the leasing of the mineral public lands of the West.

Mr. ASHURST. I know, Mr. President, that we can not finish the consideration of this bill between now and 2 o'clock, as it is now 1.45, but I want to make a further statement before I surrender the floor.

The Senator from Utah is a premier legislator. He knows in his heart that you can not pass a bill through this or any succeeding Congress allowing persons at their will to go upon Indian reservations and locate mining claims. He is too good a legislator not to know that you never can proceed except in the way of a lease of some kind.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the manganese situation of course is one that is critical. We need it. We must have it from some source. Now, I have listened with a good deal of interest to this discussion between the Senators. We have quite extensive shipments of manganese ores from New Mexico. We now have a situation of this character confronting us:

From Silver City, in Grant County, in the southern part of the State, manganese is being shipped extensively. The lands adjoining belong to individual owners, who acquired them years ago, and simply contented themselves with paying taxes upon them, and refused to work them. The situation is so critical that one department of the Government of the United States has taken up and is very seriously considering the question of having the President, under his power, condemn those adjoining lands. The owners of the lands have refused to allow the mining of the manganese, even at a royalty of $1 a ton for the ore, which is considered generally an enormous royalty, the parties mining to pay all costs and expenses and bear any losses, and of course enjoy the profits; but, as the Government fixes the price for the manganese, those profits can not be excessive. The situation is so extreme, as I say, that this matter now is under consideration.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me in his time, I understand that this legislation can not be passed before 2 o'clock.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; but I want two or three minutes before the hour of 2 o'clock arrives.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to state my position upon this bill very briefly. The royalty provided is excessive.

Mr. ASHURST. I agree with the Senator, rather.

Mr. FALL. It would simply prevent the mining of low-grade metals, including manganese, where only 50 cents per ton profit was made upon the ores.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me interrupt the Senator there. He is a valuable member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. That excessive royalty proposed to be paid to the Indians was incorporated in the bill at the request of, I will not say members, but those who really could not appreciate the difficulty in extracting metals, and the enormous outlay of money required to prepare to get the metals out.

Mr. FALL. The royalty is to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, but it is provided that he can not take a royalty of less than 5 per cent of the gross value.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; of the gross value.

Mr. FALL. Now, we have ores all over the United States to-day, on an average basis of $10 ores, that are being mined at 50 cents profit; and that is where the great copper companies of the United States to-day are making profits, on a total copper production in each ton of rock treated of less than 40 pounds of copper—out of each 2,000 pounds an extraction of 40 pounds of copper. Those mines are making more money than the other mines because they are treating an enormous tonnage. Now, if you treat a thousand tons of $10 ore at a profit of 50 cents, you are making $500 a day for your stockholders. If you impose a minimum royalty of 5 per cent of the gross value, and then compel the miner to pay all transportation costs, production costs, mining costs, and all other costs, you would prevent the opening up of a very large number of the low-grade mines of copper, silver, gold, manganese, and other metals. So that that royalty should be changed, in view of the fact that in each specific instance the Secretary of the Interior has the power to fix the royalty.

Now, just one word more, with the Senator's permission. I am going to favor this bill whenever I have an opportunity to do so. The lease system provided here does not necessarily mean that it is the forerunner of a lease system of minerals on the public domain; but even if it did, sir, I am one of those who want to see something done during this and the succeeding generation, particularly in view of the fact that we will have a good many thousand boys coming back here after the war who will need work. I want to see the resources of our country opened up and some opportunity offered for delivering the precious metals to the people. Now, it is evident that you can not do that, as the Senator has said, by providing private ownership upon Indian reservations, and I do not know that I would favor any such proposition myself; but I certainly will favor a lease proposition, and, if necessary, I will favor a lease proposition for the minerals under the surface of the ground on the public domain, so long as the surface area is left so that it can be handled in a way to increase the population of our western States.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has made a powerful argument in support of this bill, and I hope that those Senators who have not heard it will read what he said.

With respect to the 5 per cent royalty on the gross output, I agree with the Senator from New Mexico that it is almost impossible to induce anybody to take a lease on that basis; and that was inserted at the earnest insistence of Members not of this body alone, but certain worthy persons who believed they were protecting the Indians, but as a matter of fact they were making the royalty so excessive that I fear nobody will take a lease. Of course, the bill can not pass between now and 2 o'clock. There are only seven or eight minutes left. I am going to conclude, but I respectfully say that I shall again seek an opportunity to urge the passage of the bill.

At this time I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a copy of the bill and the committee report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill and report are as follows:

A bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States or to any association of such persons or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof, any part of the unallotted lands within any Indian reservation heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws for the purpose of mining for deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals, which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

SEC. 2. That after the passage and approval of this act, unallotted lands within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for the discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be located by such citizens in the same manner as mining claims are located under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the locators of all such mining claims, or their heirs, successors, or assigns, shall have a preference right to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a lease, under the terms and conditions of this act, within one year after the date of the location of any mining claim, and any such locator who shall fail to apply for a lease within one year from the date of location shall forfeit all rights to such mining claim: Provided further, That duplicate copies of the location notice shall be filed within sixty days with the superintendent in charge of the reservation on which the mining claim is located, and that application for a lease under this act may be filed with such superintendent for transmission through official channels to the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That lands containing springs, water holes, or other bodies of water needed or used by the Indians for watering live stock, irrigation, or water-power purposes shall not be designated by the Secretary of the Interior as subject to entry under this act.

SEC. 3. That leases under this act shall be for a period of 30 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the lessee may in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease.

SEC. 4. That in addition to areas of mineral land to be included in leases under this act the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to the lessee the right to use, during the life of the lease, a tract of unoccupied land, not exceeding 80 acres in area, for camp sites, milling, smelting, and refining works, and for other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the lease.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is hereby authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

SEC. 6. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

SEC. 7. That any lease granted under this act may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in the United States district court for the district in which said property or some part thereof is situated whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specifically recited in the lease.

SEC. 8. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the mineral deposits in the ground covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States, for the benefit of the Indians, a royalty which shall not be less than 5 per cent of the gross value of the output of the minerals at the mine, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the minerals from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter on the area covered by such lease at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year thereafter; 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively; and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

SEC. 9. That in addition to the payment of the royalties and rentals as herein provided the lessee shall expend annually not less than $100 in development work for each mining claim located or leased in the same manner as an annual expenditure for labor or improvements is required to be made under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the lessee shall also agree to pay all damages occasioned by reason of his mining operations to the land or allotment of any Indian or to the crops or improvements thereon: And provided further, That no timber shall be cut upon the reservation by the lessee except after first obtaining a permit from the superintendent of the reservation and upon payment of the fair value thereof.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the books and accounts of lessees, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of mining, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

SEC. 11. That all moneys received from royalties and rentals under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the reservation where the leased land is located, which moneys shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for their education, support, and civilization.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the interests of the Indians and for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the right of the State or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee.

SEC. 13. That mining locations, under the terms of this act, may be made on unallotted lands within Indian reservations by Indians who have heretofore or may hereafter be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be competent to manage their own affairs; and the said Secretary is hereby authorized and empowered to lease such lands to such Indians in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit other Indians to make locations and obtain leases under the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in regard to the working, developing, disposition, and selling of the products, and the disposition of the proceeds thereof of any such mine by such Indians.

SEC. 14. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes and Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma.

[S. Rept. No. 166, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

METALLIFEROUS MINERALS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report [to accompany S. 385]:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations, having considered the same, recommends that the bill do pass without amendment.

This bill is similar to H. R. 12426, Sixty-fourth Congress, which was adopted by the Senate. The House report (533), Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, on that bill is adopted by your committee as part of its report, as follows:

"The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12426) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations, having carefully considered the same, recommends that the bill be amended, and that as so amended the bill do pass.

"Amend the title of the bill by striking out the words 'in the State of Arizona.'

"On page 1, line 11, strike out the words 'in the State of Arizona.'

"On page 2, strike out all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'SEC. 2. That after the passage and approval of this act unallotted lands within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for and discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be.'

"On page 3, line 18, strike out the word 'twenty' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'eighty.'

"On page 4, line 25, strike out the word 'two' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'five.'

"On page 6, line 14, strike out the word 'carry' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'carrying.'

"On page 6, after line 20, insert a new section, as follows:

"'SEC. 13. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes and Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma.'

"The bill as amended will read as follows:

"'A bill to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

"'Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States or to any association of such persons or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof, any part of the unallotted lands within any Indian reservation heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws for the purpose of mining for deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals, which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

"'SEC. 2. That after the passage and approval of this act unallotted lands within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for and discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be located by such citizens in the same manner as mining claims are located under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the locators of all such mining claims, or their heirs, successors, or assigns, shall have a preference right to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a lease, under the terms and conditions of this act, within one year after the date of the location of any mining claim, and any such locator who shall fail to apply for a lease within one year from the date of location shall forfeit all rights to such mining claim: Provided further, That duplicate copies of the location notice shall be filed within 60 days with the superintendent in charge of the reservation on which the mining claim is located, and that application for a lease under this act may be filed with such superintendent for transmission through official channels to the Secretary of the Interior.

"'SEC. 3. That leases under this act shall be for a period of 50 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease.

"'SEC. 4. That in addition to areas of mineral land to be included in leases under this act the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to the lessee the right to use, during the life of the lease, a tract of unoccupied land, not exceeding 80 acres in area, for camp sites, milling, smelting, and refining works, and for other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the lease.

"'SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is hereby authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

"'SEC. 6. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held and also subject to all the provisions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

"'SEC. 7. That any lease granted under this act may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in the United States district court for the district in which said property or some part thereof is situated whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specially recited in the lease.

"'SEC. 8. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the mineral deposits in the ground covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States, for the benefit of the Indians, a royalty which shall be 5 per cent of the gross value of the output of the minerals at the mine, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the minerals from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter on the area covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year thereafter; 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively; and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

"'SEC. 9. That in addition to the payment of the royalties and rentals as herein provided the lessee shall expend annually not less than $100 in development work for each mining claim located or leased in the same manner as an annual expenditure for labor or improvements is required to be made under the mining laws of the United States.

"'SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the books and accounts of lessees, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of mining, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

"'SEC. 11. That all moneys received from royalties and rentals under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the reservation where the leased land is located, which moneys shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for their education, support, and civilization.

"'SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the interests of the Indians and for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the right of the State or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee.

"'SEC. 13. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes and Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma.'"

The Department of the Interior favors the passage of this legislation, as shown by the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 10, 1916.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEPHENS: I have your request for report upon H. R. 12426, which proposes to permit prospecting for and leasing of metalliferous mineral deposits within Indian reservations in the State of Arizona for 50-year periods upon a flat royalty of 2 per cent of the gross value of the output at the mine, the proceeds to be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians.

I favor the enactment of this measure. I find that 5 per cent is the ordinary commercial leasing rate, and would suggest that in lieu of 2 per cent. It also appears that there is a public demand that mineral deposits in Indian reservations in other States be opened to development, and I therefore suggest that the words "in the State of Arizona," in line 11, page 1, be stricken out, making the bill applicable to such deposits in all Indian reservations. It is also suggested that lines 5 to 11, page 2, be eliminated, and the following substituted therefor:

"That after the passage and approval of this act unallotted lands within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for and discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be."

The latter amendment is suggested for the reason that there may be cases where the opening of all lands within a given Indian reservation to exploration and prospecting would be destructive of the rights and interests of the Indians or inadvisable from the standpoint of public policy, and the proposed amendment gives some discretion to the officers of the United States in that connection.

In line 14, page 6, the word "carry" should be "carrying."

With these amendments, I recommend the bill be enacted.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The following table shows the area of unallotted lands included within Indian reservations in the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast States, which will be opened to prospecting for gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals in the event that this bill becomes a law:

Area of unallotted land in Indian reservations.

	Acres.
Arizona	19,551,045
California	436,211
Colorado	375,960
Idaho	55,453
Montana	4,313,416
Nevada	687,912
New Mexico	1,889,880
Oregon	1,208,469
Utah	306,880
Washington	3,150,075
Wyoming	608,526

It is well known that many of the reservations in the Western States contain large and valuable deposits of minerals, but in the absence of suitable legislation there has been no development of these resources. The Indians have not engaged in mining because they do not possess either the knowledge or the capital that is required to conduct extensive mining operations. It is the opinion of your committee that this bill offers a workable plan that will bring about development and which fully protects the interests of the Indians.

The leasing provisions of this bill have been taken without material change from applicable sections of H. R. 406, a bill to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, oil, gas, phosphate, potassium, or sodium, and H. R. 408, a bill to provide for the development of water power and the use of the public lands in relation thereto, which recently passed the House. These measures were so thoroughly discussed both in the Sixty-third and in the present Congress that it is presumed that a detailed explanation of the nature of the leases provided for in this bill is unnecessary.

The attention of those who, as a matter of principle, object to the adoption of the leasing system on the public domain is directed to the fact that the lands that may be leased for mining purposes under the provisions of this bill are the tribal property of the Indians and that it has never been the policy of the Government to permit mining on Indian reservations under the general mining laws. These lands have been set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Indians, and they are entitled to receive the same income from their property as any other private proprietor.

Owing to the present high prices of metals this is a most opportune time for the passage of a measure of this character and it is certain that its enactment into law will mean the immediate development of many valuable mines. It is the hope of your committee that a number of the Indian tribes will in time receive a sufficient income from royalties and rentals from their mineral lands, so that it will be no longer necessary to make gratuity appropriations from the Treasury for their education, support, and civilization.

As originally introduced, this bill applied to the State of Arizona only, but if the bill is made general in its scope over one-half of the total area that will be opened to prospecting and development will still be located in that State. The area of the newly created Papago Reservation in Arizona is not included in the above table, because the mineral lands within that reservation have not been withdrawn from entry or withheld from disposition under the mining laws.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say just a few words.

I recognize the fact that these reservations have been set aside for Indians not upon the ground of each individual Indian or any particular tribe having all the rights of perpetual control and ownership of those lands, because the United States Government would be doing a great wrong to the States if it set aside Indian reservations perpetually, to be exempt from taxation for State, county, or school purposes. They are set aside for the purpose of letting the Indians take special allotments in time, and in that instance the lands which they get are lands which they own, the same as we own a piece of land when we buy it; but it is expected that every one of these Indian reservations will be opened for settlement in time, and will be opened under the same conditions as in the past. They have been opened under the condition of letting the Indians have the same amount of money that the Government gets out of similar lands. If they are mineral lands, the price is $5 an acre. In the western portion of my State it is the Government price of a dollar and a quarter an acre for grazing lands; and the Government of the United States has the right, without doing any injustice whatever, to pass a law to let these lands be opened to entry just the same as the Government opens its lands for entry. Mostly it has been done by treaty with the Indians, but since that time the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Government has a right to open these lands upon the same terms that it sells its lands in that State. If that would be a wrong to the Indians, let the lands be sold at auction and the proceeds go to the Indian fund. It is not right that lands should be held in perpetuity—exempt from taxation—by the Government, either for itself or for Indian tribes.

Mr. President, the trouble with this bill is that it opens up the field of leasing the precious metals, which never has been advocated by more than a very few people in the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. The Senator, of course, is opposed to leasing the public domain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ASHURST. Now, the Senator is a most excellent lawyer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. He is. I can say that without any flattery. Does the Senator contend that these Indian reservations are in any sense public lands? Why, we now lease Indian reservations for agricultural purposes, for stock-grazing purposes, and in some instances we are now leasing Indian reservations for mining purposes. The Supreme Court has held over and over again—two decisions now come to my mind—that Indian reservations or any lands withheld from entry where a man may not make an entry of any kind are not public lands; so the Senator may favor this bill and not yield one jot or tittle of his famous opposition to a leasing proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President; there is this distinction between the two cases: These lands are not identically the same as lands owned in private ownership, because the State has no power to raise taxes upon them, and therefore you are invading the sovereignty of the State when you take away that very necessity of existence, the right of taxation. For that reason there is not the same relation between the Government and the Indians that may occupy the lands as in the case of private ownership.

The usual way in which Indian reservations have been opened to settlement by the whites has been by the entry system, identically the same as that made upon Government land, except that there can not be a free homestead entry made upon Indian reservations. There is a distinction between the two, and there ought to be, because of the fact that the Government, by reason of its power to prevent the lands being subject to taxation, is able in some instances almost to destroy a State by taking away from it its power of taxation; and the relation which exists in our form of government between the State governments and the National Government never contemplated that ultimately there should be one rule for Indian reservations and another rule for lands of private individuals.

Mr. President, the trouble with this proposition is that it goes a step further than any bill that has ever been seriously considered by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator in the minute now remaining. This bill passed the House of Representatives in the Sixty-fourth Congress in this identical form.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; and I concede that there is a great tendency for Senators to say, "Well, if this is all right for Arizona, and the Senators from that State want it, we will consent to it"; but the whole principle is wrong. In my opinion the very gentlemen who are urging the passage of this bill will find that the result will be that which has followed in the Western States, where reservations have been created and have been found to be destructive to the development of the lands of those States.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Of course, the Senator knows that this leasing principle was the principle upon which we operated prior to 1836. You could only work minerals before that time by leasing upon the public lands. Then we changed that principle, and I think very much for the better.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I do not think that is the rule.

Mr. FALL. Up until 1836 even lead mines were leased by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The only variation of parting with title to land that I know of was that which was adopted in 1806, which was when the lands were in Territories. Lead mines and zinc mines were included in that law, and Thomas H. Benton made the fight of his life, which extended over 20 years, against the leasing system, and finally got it repealed under a message to Congress sent by Mr. Polk, President of the United States, to the effect that it had been found that it had cost the Government four times as much to operate under the leasing system as the revenues which had been collected.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am informed that the pension bill (H. R. 9959) passed the House by a vote of 194 yeas to 69 nays. Therefore I ask that Senate bill 3783, to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912, be taken from the calendar and indefinitely postponed, as that is the same as the bill which passed the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 235, proposing a limitation of debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martin	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Curtis	Kellogg	Pomerene	Townsend
Fall	Kendrick	Ransdell	Trammell
Fernald	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Underwood
France	King	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gallinger	Kirby	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Gerry	Lenroot	Sherman	Warren
Gronna	Lodge	Shields	Watson
Guion	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Smith, Md.	Willey
Harding	McNary	Smith, Mich.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will yield just a minute, I understand that there are some gentlemen who do not desire to go on with the debate this evening, although there are some who do desire to speak to-morrow. In order to accommodate them and not push a vote this afternoon I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate is ready to adjourn this afternoon it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow in order to cut out routine business in the morning.

Mr. CURTIS. What effect would that have on the notice given by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that he would offer his amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not desire to take advantage of that, and I ask unanimous consent that it shall not interfere with the notice given by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will object to any compound unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask unanimous consent for my original proposition. I do that in order not to push the matter late this evening and in order to give gentlemen a chance who desire to speak to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Alabama in entire good faith what the necessity is for pressing this proposed amendment to the rules in this manner, cutting off the morning hour?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no desire to do that if there is opposition. That is the reason why I asked for unanimous consent. I will state to the Senator what my purpose is. I think on the adoption of this rule a great deal depends as to whether the Senate can get a recess before the revenue bill comes here. I am in hopes that we can dispose of business and secure a recess of reasonable length before the consideration of the revenue bill. There are appropriation bills that have to be attended to, and I should like to get a vote at a reasonably early date. I am not proposing to make a motion. If I can not get unanimous consent to take a recess this afternoon, of course we will not cut out the morning business to-morrow, but I am in hopes the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I am wondering what the Senegambian in the woodpile is in this matter. What is in the mind of the Senator in amending the rules just at the present time? Did I understand the Senator to say it was for the purpose of forcing legislation that we all expect we will have to deal with——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the revenue bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not say that at all, because I have no right to say it. I am not authorized to say it. That was not my intention; but I do know that if we pass this rule we can safely rely on expediting the revenue bill and we can safely rely on getting away from here.

On the other hand, if we have no rule it is apparent when we look at past revenue bills that it will take unlimited time. I have not any doubt in the world about the revenue bill passing ultimately; I have not any doubt about any war legislation passing ultimately, whether this rule is adopted or not, but I do believe that legislation before the Senate will receive very much more careful consideration in the whole, not some particular bill, but en masse, war legislation will receive better and more careful consideration en masse if we adopt a rule that limits the debate of the individual Member except where the Senate determines otherwise. There is no purpose right now——

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will pardon me, I merely wish to understand the parliamentary situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am out of order, I will say to the Senator, because he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FALL. That is what I want to understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was only answering a question of the leader of the minority.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will allow me to make my statement, he will understand my object. I have just been informed by the Chair that some one else has been recognized rather than myself. I want to understand the status.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the recognition went to the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). The Chair will state that when called to the chair he asked whether the Senator from New Mexico had been recognized, and the occupant of the chair said he had not.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no disposition to interfere with the right of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I am not objecting to the Senators continuing, and I hope they will, but I want to know whether I am recognized or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; the Chair will recognize the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I was informed privately that I had not been recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely rose to ask unanimous consent that we might take a recess; but it has been indicated that consent can not be given, and therefore I withdraw the request.

Mr. FALL. I will explain my position. I had risen and understood that I had been recognized. The Senator from Alabama so understood; and I yielded to him then, as I am prepared to yield now. I was then informed by a messenger that I did not have the floor. So I wanted to understand whether I did or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose to ask the Senator from New Mexico to permit me to offer a proposed amendment to the resolution that is before the Senate. I move to strike out, in the first line of the resolution, the words "period of the present war" and substitute the words "present calendar year." I ask that it be read and printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, strike out the words "period of the present war" and insert "present calendar year," so as to read:

Resolved, That during the present calendar year the rules of the Senate be amended—

And so forth.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I had a few words to say a day or two since, when the pending resolution was before the Senate, upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I favored the adoption of the amendment. With the permission of the Senate I propose to discuss shortly a concrete illustration which I think may prove of some interest. In my opinion the general rule should be that all treaties sent to this body for ratification should be considered in open session, and the exception to that rule should provide for the consideration of such treaties in secret session and not in open session; in fact the reverse of the present position, which is that under the rules now the consideration of a treaty must be in secret session, the exception being that by a vote of the Senate it may be considered in open session.

Mr. President, fortunately for my argument and as explaining my position, there is a treaty pending at this time before this body the seal of secrecy upon which has been by the action of the body itself removed. There are a majority and a minority report from the Committee on Foreign Relations accompanying the resolution of ratification offered by the majority to this treaty, and the seal of secrecy has been removed from this report. Therefore, while the Senate itself, under the rules, can not consider the ratification of the treaty except behind closed doors, individual Senators are in a position where they can discuss the provisions of the treaty without violating either a rule or etiquette. I shall take advantage of this parliamentary situation to refer at more or less length to the treaty known at the Colombian treaty.

By the terms of this treaty the United States of America, obtaining nothing whatsoever except an obligation upon the part of Colombia that she will agree upon the delimitation of the boundaries of the Republic of Panama or agree to have a survey made of such boundaries—obtaining nothing else whatsoever from Colombia—extends to Colombia an apology of this great Nation for certain occurrences in the past and delivers to Colombia of the people's money $25,000,000.

In addition, however, to the $25,000,000, which is merely a bagatelle in these days of billions, there are other considerations given by the United States to Colombia which I most strenuously object to. I am firmly convinced that by open discussion of the provisions of this treaty the people of the United States will never allow it to be ratified in the form in which it is pending before this body or with the amendments suggested by the majority of the committee.

Mr. President, the first article of the treaty negotiated between this country and Colombia——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will yield to me just a moment before he leaves the statement he last made, referring to the advantages of the publicity of this treaty, does the Senator believe that the American people generally understand the character of government in Colombia that led to the formation of the Republic of Panama and the subsequent dealings of this country with the newly established Republic and its recognition in a former administration?

Mr. FALL. I have not the remotest idea that the people of the United States understand the character of the personnel of the Colombian Government, nor do I think they understand anything of the constitution of the Colombian Government as it existed at the time the controversy arose between Colombia and the United States by virtue of our recognition of Panama, nor have they ever understood it. They did not understand it, in my judgment, when the Grenadines treaty of 1846 was entered into, as I shall show by reference to certain historical facts.

The first article of the proposed treaty provides:

ARTICLE I.

The Government of the United States of America, wishing to put at rest all controversies and differences with the Republic of Colombia arising out of the events from which the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama resulted, expresses, in its own name and in the name of the people of the United States, sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or to mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between the two nations.

This is an apology for the act of a former administration of this Government which at least thought that it represented the people of the United States and spoke in the name of the people of the United States, certainly as clearly or representing certainly as great a majority of those people as does the administration which negotiated the present treaty. However, I do not care to dwell at any length upon the apology, and I shall only refer very shortly to the occasion for our acts accompanying which the apology is now extended.

I am not going into the details of the Panaman revolution. I shall not undertake to rehearse the evidence or the rumors, nor shall I undertake at this time to conclude as to whether the Panaman revolution was simply an uprising of those natives who were indisposed to the continuation of the so-called Government of Colombia over that Province or whether it was brought about by those who were desirous of concluding the deal for the French-owned Wyse concession through which they were acquiring $40,000,000. I am simply saying in passing that the evidence which I have discovered would lead just as strongly to the conclusion that those who were interested in selling the Wyse concession for $40,000,000 to the people of the United States were engaged in fostering the revolution, that such evidence leads much more closely to those interested in selling than it ever has led to anyone interested in the purchase. As a matter of fact, there has been no evidence of any kind or character worthy of consideration at all showing that anyone interested in the purchase had anything whatsoever to do with the Panaman revolution.

There is ample evidence charges have been openly made, even recently, and openly discussed in Colombia itself and in Panama, that those interested in selling secured the placing of certain officials in Panama through officials of Colombia at that time for the purpose of bringing on a revolution and that certain financial considerations passed.

However, as I said, I shall not undertake to discuss the details of this proposition. I will admit, for the sake of the argument in which I am engaged at present, that the act of the United States Government in placing its marines upon Panaman soil and protecting the American owned, or practically so, the American and French owned railroad, which it was under treaty obligations directly to protect, possibly retarded the reassertion of sovereignty by Colombia over Panama. In other words, if she had been allowed without interference to use the Panaman railroad for the transportation of her troops to different points in Panama, it might have been more easy, at any rate, for her to defer the final freedom of the Panaman Republic. Such action of ours may have had that effect. If so, by those who insist that we were under any treaty obligation to Colombia, such action should not be criticized, because this was a specific proposition embraced in the old treaty of 1846.

Upon the theory, then—and that is the only theory advanced as to the obligation resting upon us to pay Colombia anything—that the action of the United States Government prevented the Colombian troops from being transported over our railroads for the purpose of fighting the Panamans, upon that theory of right, and upon no further theory except that, it is suggested by some one that we will achieve the favor, at least receive the approval and in some way approach more nearly the friendship of the other Latin-American countries, if we simply hand over to Colombia an apology and $25,000,000, we are urged to adopt the treaty.

Upon these two theories, the one that our action in landing our soldiers had something to do with the securing of the freedom of the Panamans, upon that theory of right entitling them to compensation, and upon the other general theory that by money given to some one we may secure the friendship of certain Latin-American countries, including Colombia, we are asked to extend this apology and pay the $25,000,000.

But we are asked to do something more than that, Mr. President, and I will undertake to show by the wording of the treaty itself that if you, on the one hand, by the payment of this money and the extension of this apology might persuade some other Latin-American countries that we were inclined to be at least friendly toward Latin America, if our action would have that effect, it would be offset by the fact that in the treaty itself such discrimination is made in favor of Colombia and against every other Latin-American nation, even against Panama itself, which we are under obligations, and treaty obligations, to protect; a reading of the treaty will show that such discrimination is being made against the interest of every other Latin-American country on this continent, and any good effect produced by our apology and surrender of our money will be more than offset by the ill effects following the ratification of the treaty in its present terms.

Under article 2, clause 1, it is provided:

The Republic of Colombia shall be at liberty at all times to transport through the interoceanic canal its troops, materials of war, and ships of war, even in case of war between Colombia and another country, without paying any charges to the United States.

In the first place, this is a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to start with. Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will all recall, the fleets of all nations are to be treated alike, and we have provided tolls for the ships of all other nations; but now we provide that the ships of war, troops, and munitions of Colombia shall pass through the canal free of all tolls. The treaty further provides:

2. The products of the soil and industry of Colombia passing through the canal, as well as the Colombian mails, shall be exempt from any charge or duty other than those to which the products and mails of the United States may be subject.

That is an absolute violation of the favored-nation clause with every nation with which we have such a treaty, in the first place, and is a discrimination in favor of the transportation of the goods of Colombia against the transportation of the goods of every other nation upon the earth, and particularly applicable to the case which I suggested a moment ago, and is a discrimination against all the other Latin American nations on this continent.

The products of the soil and industry of Colombia, such as cattle, salt, and provisions, shall be admitted to entry in the Canal Zone, and likewise in the islands and mainland occupied or which may be occupied by the United States as auxiliary and accessory thereto, without paying other duties or charges than those payable by similar products of the United States.

There is another discrimination in favor of Colombia and against all other countries, not only on this continent, but a violation of the favored-nation clause with every nation with which we have such a treaty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator from New Mexico passes from that branch of the subject, I should like to ask under what authority this Government can fix the tariff on goods entering the Panama Canal Zone, remembering that we did not secure sovereignty, but merely a right of way, and acknowledged the right of Panama to exercise complete sovereignty over that territory, except such as we exercised by virtue of our contract to secure the right of way?

Mr. FALL. I do not think, Mr. President, with due deference to the Senator from North Dakota, that the treaty between the United States and Panama has been construed as he would suggest, and I do not agree as to that being the proper construction of it. I think that, in so far as our tariff laws are concerned, the United States can provide and can enforce—I mean under the terms of the treaty—the tariff laws for the Panama Canal Zone, not, of course, for the Republic of Panama, but for the Canal Zone.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say, in order that that statement may not go unchallenged, that I think, if the Senator will look a little deeper into that subject, he will find that we have no right to control the tariff of other countries in reference to entry into the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. FALL. I have no doubt in the world, as I have already said, that, irrespective of how that question might be settled, this provision of the treaty is a violation of treaty obligations in treaties containing the favored-nation clause, first, and is an absolute discrimination in favor of one Latin-American country as against others, which will be very deeply resented by every other Latin-American country, and that this assertion would go without question as to those who are familiar with the Latin-American character.

I may say that this question as to business upon the Panama Canal Zone is going to be, in my judgment, one of very great and material interest to the people of the United States. When this war is over, Mr. President, I look to see the reshipping business, even the general wholesale business, from all points of the American hemisphere grow by leaps and bounds, particularly in the Panama Canal Zone. It will be necessary to have great stores of coal, naval stores, and products of all kinds there with which to furnish provisions and outfits to all ships which are engaged particularly in the coastwise trade on the entire hemisphere, as well as such ships as will be passing through the Canal which will be engaged in deep-sea commerce. In my judgment, the Panama Canal Zone will offer, even within the course of a few years, a field of almost unlimited extent for the industry of the United States, and from the Panama Canal Zone the business men of the United States can and will come in closer contact with the people of the Latin-American States than they would have come under any circumstances had we not constructed the Panama Canal and obtained at least rights within the Panama Canal Zone.

Now, Mr. President, let us go a litle further with this treaty:

3. Colombian citizens crossing the Canal Zone shall, upon production of proper proof of their nationality, be exempt from every toll, tax, or duty to which citizens of the United States are not subject.

There is another discrimination against all the people of the earth, particularly the people of Latin America, and another violation of the favored-nation clause. Clause 4 of this article provides—and I will ask Senators to pay particular attention to the wording of this clause—

4. During the construction of the interoceanic canal and afterwards, whenever traffic by the canal is interrupted or whenever it shall be necessary for any other reason to use the railway, the troops, materials of war, products, and mails of the Republic of Colombia, as above mentioned, shall, even in case of war between Colombia and another country, be transported on the railway between Ancon and Cristobal, or on any other railway substituted therefor, paying only the same charges and duties as are imposed upon the troops, materials of war, products, and mails of the United States.

Mr. President, no other country is extended this privilege at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would not the Senator believe that that would make us an ally of Colombia in any war in which she might be engaged?

Mr. FALL. Why, Mr. President, it makes the United States practically an ally of Colombia against every other Latin-American country. It is an offense to those countries which have joined us in this war as our allies to-day. Senators will remember that Colombia has not taken such action; to no other country is granted the privilege of transporting its troops and its munitions of war over the Panama Railroad under any conditions, certainly if she is at war with a country with which we are at war. But, further, see what we have done in this paragraph with poor little Panama:

The officers, agents, and employees of the Government of Colombia shall, upon production of proper proof of their official character or their employment, also be entitled to passage on the said railway on the same terms as officers, agents, and employees of the Government of the United States. The provisions of this paragraph shall not, however, apply in case of war between Colombia and Panama.

Mr. President, the quarrel of Colombia is with Panama. Her quarrel with us is simply that we prevented her carrying to the bitter end her quarrel with Panama; and we have provided that, in a war against Panama itself, she shall have absolute freedom of transportation through the canal, and we have only restricted her as to transportation upon the railroad in case she is at war with Panama. The Republic of Colombia, declaring war against Panama to-morrow, is, under the terms of section 4, excluded from the use of the railroad for the transportation of her troops and munitions of war, but under section 3 she is granted absolutely the right of transportation through the canal, and she may land her soldiers wherever she pleases and attack Panama from behind.

Clause 5 of this article provides:

Coal, petroleum, and sea salt, being the product of Colombia, passing from the Atlantic coast of Colombia to any Colombian port on the Pacific coast, and vice versa, shall be transported over the aforesaid railway free of any charge, except the actual cost of handling and transportation, which shall not in any case exceed one-half of the ordinary freight charges levied upon similar products of the United States passing over the railway and in transit from one port to another of the United States.

That is not only a special privilege granted to Colombia over any other nation of the earth, it is not only a violation of the favored-nation clause with every nation which we have such a treaty, it is not only a violation of our obligations to treat the other Latin-American countries as we treat one, but it is a discrimination in favor of Colombia in the transportation of her goods over the railroad as against the citizens of the United States themselves; in other words, the citizen of New York or of Florida, transporting goods over the railroad, pays the ordinary price, while a citizen of Colombia, transporting similar goods over the railway, pays but 50 per cent of the ordinary price.

Why, Mr. President, some ingenious Colombian or some attorney for Colombia, expecting undoubtedly large compensation from this large amount of money which we are requested to pay, has evidently drawn this so-called treaty, and has had it passed upon in some way by our State Department, without having any American lawyer look into the different provisions of it. I think there has never been such an attempt made in negotiating any treaty in this country to violate every obligation to all the countries of the earth with which we have treaties as is shown by this treaty which is now before us. Certainly there has never been any treaty proposed to the Senate of the United States for its ratification which violated every principle of international comity as does this treaty.

I think simply calling attention to these different extraordinary provisions of the treaty should be sufficient; but, Mr. President, what has been said about it? What does the public know about it? What did the people of the United States hear when the discussion of the Colombian treaty came up?

Their attention had been directed to one point, and one point only, and that was that by the action of the United States in recognizing the independence of Panama, after taking armed possession of the Panama Railroad, as we were obligated to do, we did a great injury to Colombia, and that we were under treaty obligations to protect her interests in Panama rather than in any way, directly or indirectly, to aid the Panamans in securing their independence.

Upon this point I wish to speak very briefly, without endeavoring to go into a general discussion of the subject. Admitting, as I have said, for the sake of argument, that the action of the United States did materially assist in securing the independence of Panama, let us see for a moment whether the United States was under any obligation whatsoever by virtue of the treaty of 1846 to cooperate with Colombia in suppressing the Panaman revolution, or whether we were under obligation even to stand aside in the controversy then raging between the people of these two countries.

In the first place, Mr. President, the treaty of 1846 was entered into between this country and what was known at that time as the Republic of New Granada, and those who advocate the ratification of this treaty or the payment of any funds to Colombia insist that Colombia is the successor of the Republic of New Granada, and that, therefore, any obligation which we had with the Republic of New Granada extended to its successor in interest, the Republic of Colombia.

Let us look back into the history of these countries for a moment. The Republic of New Granada originally comprised the present Venezuelan confederation, the present Republic of Ecuador, a portion of the present Republic of Bolivia, and the States going to make up the present Republic of Colombia, including the then sovereign State of Panama. From time to time States broke away from this Republic, particularly after the death of Bolivar, who had achieved the independence of this portion of South America from Spanish rule. In 1830 Venezuela, a sovereign State in the Republic of New Granada, withdrew, as she had a right to do, from the confederation. Following her action, Ecuador withdrew and Bolivia withdrew and was constituted a republic later, leaving the States originally comprised in the old Kingdom of New Granada as known under the viceroyalty of that name.

Panama was originally the Province of Castilla del Oro, extending from Cape Gracias a Dios to the Sea of Darien. She was a sovereign State among the sovereign States of the so-called New Granadan Republic, and under the constitution she retained to herself all the sovereignty which each one of the original 13 States of our Union retained prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1787.

There were some 11 States remaining in the New Granadan Republic. In 1846, when we entered into this treaty with the New Granadan Republic, they were operating under the constitution recognizing the sovereignty of the different States and only the national sovereignty in certain restricted matters, just exactly as our confederation did. They had one revolution after another, and in 1863 finally formed a constitution, which continued until it was put out of business by a dictator in 1886. Under the constitution of 1863 Panama retained to herself the right to protect herself, and distinctly by words precluded the right of the National Government of Colombia, or of any other State within Colombia, to enter her borders with armed forces under any circumstances, except by her invitation.

Mr. President, as establishing the conditions existing and leading up to the suppression of the constitution of Colombia, I wish to read an extract from the "Constitution of Colombia," a work by Pombo y Guerra, found in the public library here in the original Spanish. There is no translation of this work at all, and I may say to Senators that I think there is no very accurate history of Colombia; but the two volumes of Pombo y Guerra, being a history of the constitutions and laws of Colombia, is by far the most accurate account or historical record of Colombia from the beginning down to the present time which is obtainable. Unfortunately, however, as I have said, there is no translation of it.

In 1880 Nunez seized forcible control of the Government of Colombia, and for more than six years ruled as an absolute dictator under no constitution whatsoever, except a constitution promulgated by his decree in 1886. In that year he himself personally, as dictator, promulgated a constitution for the Republic, and it was under his promulgated constitution that Panama was deprived not only of her sovereignty but even of her rights as a State. When we found her at the time she revolted it was necessary to maintain an armed force in Panama at all times to coerce the people of Panama into a semblance of quietude, because she was shorn of her powers as a sovereign State by the decree of a dictator. What I shall read to you now is given by Pombo y Guerra as the reason for it. I quote from the account of Luis Carlos Rico, secretary to Nunez:

In 1873 there occurred a matter creating great alarm for the Republic. There was a conflict in the city of Panama, and the Government of that State requested that the troops from a North American ship of war should be disembarked. * * * Such disembarkation was effected, and on the city hall or municipal buildings of that settlement was seen flying the flag of the United States of America, and the soldiers of the same country with arms on their shoulders gave that protection and security which legally could not be extended by the General Government of Colombia.

Mr. President, this statement of Carlos Rico was the apology urged by Nunez for forcing his so-called constitution upon the people of Colombia at the muzzle of the guns of his soldiers. Along with his constitution and the decree putting it into force, went this statement of Carlos Rico as to the necessity for it. Under the old constitution Panama was a sovereign State; under the constitution she had not senators in the upper house of the Colombian Parliament; but under the terms of the constitution itself she had plenipotentiaries, there being two from each State, ambassadors simply representing in their character as plenipotentiaries a sovereign State under a federal union or confederation and not under a Republic. By the terms of the constitution, if I remember aright, Panama retained to herself the right to invite whomsoever she pleased for her defense, and it was provided distinctly that Colombia should have no right to enter her territory with armed forces.

The Wyse concession was made in 1876 originally, and renewed in 1878, and it became, of course, apparent to all South America, and particularly to such patriots as Mr. Nunez, that there was now an opportunity to have the Panama Canal built, and that if Colombia could control it by forcibly relegating the sovereign State of Panama to the position simply of a Province, to Colombia would go the funds to be paid under the Wyse concession or under any other concession, and not to the sovereign State of Panama itself, which would be entitled to it under the constitution. So, without the acquiescence of Panama, in fact, over the military protest of Panama, Panama was subjugated by the forces of Nunez in 1886, and from that time held in bondage as a Province, when she had been a sovereign State from 1819 up to that time.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Had there been any sort of negotiations entered into or any prospect of negotiations for the construction of a canal before Colombia forcibly took over the territory of Panama in 1886?

Mr. FALL. There had been; there had been various attempts. Of course, the negotiations for the building of a canal across the Isthmus at some point had gone on almost from 1670—I think that was the year—when the English first investigated the matter. Of course, the matter was discussed long before that by the old Spaniards, who made their first settlement in Panama, I think, in the year 1503, Columbus having first discovered and sailed up the coast of Panama. The first settlement was made, if I recall correctly, at the old town of Darien, which for many years was the great town and was the point from which all the silver and gold galleons started out to the west coast and from which they departed for Spain.

Mr. WATSON. I think that we are all more or less familiar with the agitation for a canal, but possibly it had reference to the Nicaraguan Canal.

Mr. FALL. No; the Darien Canal was the first canal suggested, going up the Atrata River, long before the Nicaraguan Canal was even thought of. The Darien Canal project, as I have said, was the original project long before it was even suggested that we should go through the Isthmus, as we have done, and long before the San Juan River route in Nicaragua was even investigated or thought of, which was in comparatively recent years.

Mr. WATSON. In other words, the Senator is ready to assert that the fact that there might be a canal cut across there at some time was the impelling motive that induced Colombia to take possession of Panama?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly. The negotiations which resulted in the original Wyse concession in 1876 had been carried on for years prior to that. It was in 1873 that the occurrence in Panama, to which I have referred, took place; and it was long after the granting of the Wyse concession that Panama was reduced to the condition of a vassal, not, in fact, until subsequent to the issue of the decree of 1886, 10 years after the Wyse concession had been granted, when it became apparent that it was of great value.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the railroad negotiations were even earlier than that, were they not?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; the railroad negotiations were prior to 1846, and resulted finally in the treaty of 1846. Of course the historical facts are that Great Britain and the United States were rivals prior to 1846. In 1850 we entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That was a settlement of our rivalry at that time. Each nation had been reaching out for canal routes across the Isthmus from Darien to the San Juan route in Nicaragua, and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in 1850 was an attempted settlement of these difficulties; and, of course, that treaty having been entered into, necessitated its abrogation in 1901, when we undertook to construct the canal under the provisions of our subsequent agreement with the Republic of Panama. But I want to impress upon the Senators here that Panama, under the constitution of Colombia, had a right to declare her independence, or at least she had a right to refuse to allow a Colombian soldier to enter her borders. There was a provision in the constitution that neither one of the States should grant to any foreign country any right of sovereignty without the permission of the other States. This was the principal clause in the articles of confederation; but equally plainly was it written that neither the Republic of Colombia nor any other State had a right to enter with military forces the soil of any one of the sovereign States of the Republic. As I have read to you from the translation of Luis Carlos Rico's statement accompanying the promulgation of the Nunez dictatorial decree, the very fact that this existed, and that the Panama Canal route was becoming valuable, and that there was money in it, was the foundation for the overthrow by force of arms of the sovereignty of Panama, to which overthrow Panama never consented. She retained, up to the time that she declared and obtained her independence, her right of independence and her right to deal with foreign affairs under the constitution and under the articles of confederation by which she was bound to Colombia.

These are historical facts. These are the actual conditions. We found Panama in this condition. She had a right to declare her independence. She did so. We were fortunately at hand with our marines to do exactly what we had done, and our action in doing which had been acquiesced in by the Colombian Government in a dozen different instances. We were fortunately at hand to take possession of the railroad. We took possession of the railroad in 1873, as Carlos Rico said, when Colombia, as he says, legally could not do it, and could not protect Panama, which was true. Neither could she legally send her soldiers to that road when we refused to allow them to travel over it. She was beyond her legal rights. She had no right, in opposition to the wishes of the people of Panama itself, to send her troops upon Panaman soil. She was bound by her constitutional prohibition not to do so. She sent them there. We were bound to keep open the line of transit, under the treaty. We were bound by our material interests, of course, to prevent a bloody revolution. We had adopted exactly the same method in four or five different instances from 1846 down to the time that Panama declared her independence. Never had there been protests against it before. Even in 1873, Colombia made no protest, because under her constitution she had no right to make protest. We had been invited there by Panama, as Rico says, and Colombia had no legal right to interfere. We were invited by Panama to take charge, to put our marines upon the railroad, and to protect it. We did so. We were invited by Panama to recognize her independence. She had a right to extend the invitation. We had a legal right, without the violation of any treaty obligation whatsoever, to extend our recognition, and we did so.

Mr. President, aside from the historical matters to which I have referred, let any lawyer read the treaty of 1846 and show me one word which attempts in any way whatsoever to guarantee to the New Granadan Republic or the Granadan Republic her sovereignty over any State. It was ridiculous to suggest such an idea—that it was the intention of the treaty of 1846 to compel us to guarantee her sovereignty over Panama, or not to recognize the independence of Panama or any other State. Could there have been anything which would have prevented us recognizing the independence of Venezuela when she seceded? Could there have been anything to prevent us from recognizing the independence of Ecuador when she seceded, or the independence of Bolivia when she set up a separate Government? We were under no obligation whatsoever to guarantee anything except the free right of transit; and the sovereignty that Colombia had of the Granadan Republic, the predecessor in interest of Colombia, over the right of transit. Why? Because Great Britain was reaching out for a right of transit, and at that time had negotiations on with the Republic of Nicaragua for the Nicaraguan route. She claimed Greytown, at the mouth of the San Juan, and stood in our way in attempting to secure the San Juan River route from Nicaragua for years. Over our protest she had a protectorate over certain Indian tribes that she claimed owned the mouth of the San Juan River. She prevented Nicaragua for years from entering into a treaty with us by which we might secure the Nicaraguan route. She was threatening the shortest route overland of the people in the East of the United States to the gold fields of California. We were guaranteeing the sovereignty, the ownership of New Granada or of its sovereign States over this route—we might as well be plain about it—as against Great Britain, which was setting up claims by virtue of her ownership of territory now reduced to the extent of British Honduras, which cuts Guatemala off from an outlet on the Gulf of Mexico. Her claim of ownership was very much greater at that time. It extended down to Panama itself. She was threatening all the time. We stepped in, and by virtue of the treaty we obtained a right to ourselves, in consideration of which we agreed that we would defend or keep open that route of transit against even Great Britain. We might as well have written her name into the treaty, as you will see if you will go back to the history of that time.

Mr. President, this is about all that I have to say upon this subject. I have spoken as I have about it because, in the first place, it is a matter which has been misunderstood by the people of the United States. It has been said that Mr. Roosevelt committed a great outrage by landing there the United States marines and then in recognizing the independence of Panama. Under international law every act of Mr. Roosevelt's was perfectly justifiable, and under the treaty which they appealed to themselves his landing of troops was obligatory to maintain open the route of transit, and at that time this was the only route of transit.

It may be that by virtue of the fact that under the Wyse concession Colombia was to receive very large financial largess from the construction of the canal; it may be that by virtue of the fact that she agreed in the Hay-Herran treaty that she would accept $10,000,000 to quiet all questions, and that again in the tripartite treaties entered into while former Senator Root was Secretary of State, by which we agreed to see that Panama made over to Colombia a certain portion of the money which we were paying Panama, that Colombia sincerely believes that we should make some payment to her. By her own acts she lost the opportunity to get the money which Panama received. It may be, however, that by this series of attempted treaties, recognizing some equity in Colombia, we are under some obligation to her—of what character? No legal obligation.

Mr. President, I say now that Colombia, if she is friendly to the United States, is willing to do away with the old Granadan treaty of 1846, which has been outgrown for 40 years, which is obsolete, except as she has demanded under it that we recompense her in some way for her loss of the Panama Canal. It may be that it would be worth some money to the people of the United States to have the boundary lines of the Republic of Panama definitely fixed, as they have never been fixed on the ground, and there is yet a dispute as to the boundary lines between Colombia and Panama. It may be that it would be best for our interests to secure the recognition of the Panaman Republic by the Republic of Colombia, which has always refused such recognition. It may be that it would be very advantageous to the people of the United States if they could enter into a treaty with Colombia by which Colombia agreed that she would remain neutral and not allow the use of her ports or her coasts to any nation with which we were at war. It might be that it would be advantageous to us to enter into a mutual agreement of that kind that either country would remain neutral in a war in which the other was engaged, and that we would not allow the use of our ports or our coasts, and that she reciprocally would not allow the use of her ports or of her coasts. Of course, under international law she is obligated to do that now; but if we had a provision in a treaty by which we had the authority to search those coasts ourselves, and ourselves to enforce the provisions of the treaty in the event of her inability to do so, we would achieve something which it would be worth paying even some money to achieve.

In my judgment, a proposition made to Colombia to-day along businesslike and reasonable lines would be successful, even if those lines were based somewhat upon the suggestions which I have made, as vague as they are. I may say that I have reason to believe that Colombia would look with favor upon a self-respecting treaty, not offensive, but at any rate mutually defensive, between the two countries, and by which she would receive a certain measure of protection against the aggressions of those whom she is not able to meet, just as Nicaragua has been glad to enter into such a treaty with the United States. It has been my idea of our diplomacy with reference to Latin-American countries that we should proceed with the interests and the friendship of each equally in view whenever we entered into a negotiation with one. If we succeeded in closing negotiations with Colombia along the line that I have suggested, I would provide in the treaty itself that any provisions as to transit through the canal or over the railroad placed in the treaty by us for the benefit of Colombia should be equally extended to any other Latin American country entering into the same treaty with us.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator. I was about to yield the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator closes, would it not be fair, to say the least, in the event we approach this treaty, to strike out the part that tenders an apology to Colombia, and ourselves forego the right to inquire into what I consider the exceedingly bad faith of the Colombian Government in matters leading up to the continuation of the concession to the French company that was about to expire? I think the historical facts of the diplomatic correspondence on that subject would show that the Colombian Government intended to delay us and lull us into a feeling of security until the time arrived when they could declare a forfeiture, and then, after that time had come, to declare that forfeiture and take away not only from Panama but from us the right to deal with it; and that the attendant circumstances showed such bad faith that when it comes to a question of apologies we could stand off one against the other, to say the least, and keep still about it.

Mr. FALL. And having done that, and having stricken out the first article of the treaty, I wish the Senator would join me in striking out each of the other articles discriminating against every other country and violating every treaty between this country and every other country with which we have a favored-nation clause.

Mr. President, I am not opposed to—in fact, I very strongly favor—a just and equitable treaty with Colombia. Colombia commands both sides of the Panama Canal. Her territory extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific south of the Isthmus of Panama. I have reason to believe that citizens of a foreign country with which we are not on friendly terms have, during the last few years, been engaged in certain river work at Darien and on the Magdalena and the Atrato and at Barranquilla. I have no information at all as to the point to which this work has been carried or the development of it, but it is being done, or was being done, under a concession made by Colombia, and it undoubtedly could be developed to the point where submarines could find a very safe harbor. However, I am not an alarmist and I do not want to drag those things into it. I can see where it is advantageous for us to settle all differences with Colombia and to have a treaty with her providing that the people of the United States secure some of the benefits of the treaty and do not place themselves on record as violating their obligations to every other nation written into treaties and violating obligations which we are so constantly proclaiming through speeches and otherwise to the Latin-American people on this hemisphere.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not care at this time to make any other reply to the Senator from New Mexico than to read a part of the treaty which was made between the United States and New Granada in 1846, the treaty to which he has referred, but of which, I think, he has given an entirely inaccurate impression. I shall not read all of Article XXXV, but I shall read enough of it to show that the United States received very valuable concessions from New Granada at that time and valuable rights on the Isthmus, and that the United States made very definite and specific promises to New Granada in consideration of those valuable benefits.

A part of Article XXXV of that treaty reads as follows:

> The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens; that any lawful produce, manufactures, or merchandise belonging to citizens of the United States thus passing from one sea to the other, in either direction, for the purpose of exportation to any other foreign country, shall not be liable to any import duties whatever; or, having paid such duties, they shall be entitled to drawback upon their exportation; nor shall the citizens of the United States be liable to any duties, tolls, or charges of any kind to which native citizens are not subjected for thus passing the said Isthmus. And in orer to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages and for the favors they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty, the United States guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and in consequence the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory.

One of the rights of sovereignty which New Granada had over that territory was the right to land her soldiers there and to suppress a rebellion, and that right the United States denied and defied at that time by force of arms, in refusing to permit the soldiers of New Granada to land upon that territory, the sovereignty of which we had guaranteed to New Granada.

I am not going to discuss the matter further. There is no present intention of pushing a treaty such as has been sent to the Senate, but there is and there must be in the future an occasion when the United States will recognize the obligation which she owes to New Granada and make good to her, in some sense at least, the wrong that we committed against her.

Mr. WILFLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Missouri, I should like to say just a word.

Mr. WILFLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I want to clear the record. I do not enjoy very much having the inference drawn from what the Senator has just said that I have attempted to misstate, or not state fully, the proposition which I was advancing to the Senate. I referred distinctly to the guaranty and repeated it in practically the words which the Senator has just read; and I construed it to mean what it says it means, that it guarantees by Article XXXV the right of free transit. That is the guaranty, and to effect that right of sovereignty of New Granada against what? Not against Panama.

The whole question of this old treaty has been discussed time and again.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY] has the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Ashurst	Hollis	Page	Sutherland
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Tillman
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Trammell
Fall	Kellogg	Saulsbury	Underwood
Fletcher	Kendrick	Shafroth	Vardaman
France	Kirby	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Gallinger	McNary	Sherman	Watson
Harding	Martin	Simmons	Willey
Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Md.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. NUGENT, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. WARREN answered to their names when called.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. KENYON, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. GUION, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. KING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. WILFLEY. Mr. President, I believe that the circumstances of the times demand and justify the adoption of this resolution to amend the rules of the Senate so that they will limit the time of debate on any bill or resolution during the period of the war. This resolution is in harmony with the spirit of the people to speed up every instrumentality engaged in the conduct of the war. The Senate of the United States has been for more than a century the greatest forum in the world for free and unlimited discussion of subjects of legislation. In ordinary times, when deliberation and full discussion of all matters may be indulged without endangering the success of ventures on which the Nation is embarked and on the speedy progress of which the very existence of the Nation depends, this characteristic of this body has been regarded as one of the bulwarks of the Government; but these are no ordinary times.

This is the greatest crisis in the history of the world, and the destiny of the human race depends upon the outcome of our present undertaking. This Nation is now engaged in the great enterprise of preserving for posterity the blessings of Christian civilization and free government, developed through 19 centuries of struggle for the achievement of a world society of justice and mercy, and of overpowering and driving out of existence the greatest organization for the promotion of iniquity and oppression that the powers of darkness have ever launched against humanity in all history.

There is one outstanding question which must be considered carefully, profoundly, and with the utmost sincerity of which the human mind and heart is capable by everyone who is called upon to act in any capacity touching the activities of the Government in this critical time in the Nation's affairs. That question is:

> Will our course of action speed us on our way to the goal of our great undertaking or will our action weaken the arm which is now raised to strike down this cruel force and delay the achievement of our great purpose?

In answer to this question we must find the compass which should direct our course in every undertaking. Nothing should be done that will divert the attention or dissipate the energy of those on whom the execution of our war plans depends. Our every act must be for the purpose of strengthening the determination and increasing the ability of the Government to carry on the war with the utmost efficiency, to the end of complete, speedy, and glorious victory with a righteous and permanent peace which may never again be assailed by a selfish, arrogant, plotting autocracy.

The questions which in this crisis are before us for consideration are such as demand speedy action. Our forces are in the field, on foreign soil, engaged in desperate struggle with a powerful, active, and persistent enemy. Our Navy is on the far-flung battle line of the high seas in desperate combat with the skulking foe of decency and honor who hesitates not to take the lives of thousands of women and children if by so doing he may gain one atom of advantage for his unholy cause. Our activity in such time is to exercise the power conferred upon us by the Constitution and to marshal the resources of the Nation to the support of our forces in the field and our Navy upon the seas. The task of directing these forces is upon the executive department of the Government, and that department must look to us to provide the money with which executive plans must be carried out, and to extend authority by which the executive machinery may be better organized. When we are called upon to exercise that function, we must act speedily, and we must put our organization in such condition that we not only may, but that we certainly will, secure such action. We must not permit to exist in this body, under our rules, a situation in which any individual or any group of individuals, in the exercise of personal opinion or privilege with reference to any matter before us, may delay action beyond the time imperatively needed for a proper consideration by us of the methods by which we shall accomplish the things which we must do. The demands of our consciences and of the people compel us to clear our decks for the speedy performance of the duty that may from time to time be upon us.

The people are deeply concerned and thoroughly aroused to the situation. They are ready to make the supreme sacrifice and render the utmost service for this great cause of humanity. They realize that all things—their comforts, their means, and even the lives of millions of their sons—are now on the altar of sacrifice to the cause of winning this stupendous war. The people know we are launched upon a desperate undertaking and they are desperately in earnest in their determination to see it through to a successful conclusion. They repose the greatest confidence in the Chief Executive of the Nation, and they demand that he be left unhampered and uninterrupted in this great work. They want action in every activity of the Government that will be definitely helpful to our soldiers who are fighting in the trenches to win this war. They are opposed to unnecessary discussion here or elsewhere of any question, because they know that such discussion delays action and furnishes comfort and encouragement to the enemy. They know that those in charge of the various undertakings of the Government are not infallible, are not endowed with superhuman wisdom, but they do not want mistakes continually paraded when they have been corrected or are in the process of correction by those who know best how to correct them. The people want those things done that will stimulate courage and valor, and they feel great resentment of any influence that tends to weaken or destroy the resolute purpose of the Nation.

The founders of our Government, with wisdom not equaled elsewhere in the deliberations of men, set up three divisions of government with relations so nicely adjusted in the fundamental law of the land that each is to some extent a check upon the other. I would not take from any branch of the Government one smallest part of the power vested in it by the Constitution, nor would I raise my voice against the undertaking by the legislative department of the full obligation corollary to the powers given it in connection with the activities of the other branches of the Government, but I submit that at this time, when it is inconceivable that any branch of the Government should not act in all things with the greatest devotion to our great cause, it is incumbent upon us that we turn our attention from the function of checking other branches of the Government and direct our full power to effective support of the work which is imposed upon the executive department.

In order that the resources and energy of the Nation might be effectively organized, Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional rights, has conferred upon the President extraordinary powers for conducting the war. This step was taken for the purpose of enabling the Nation to meet an emergency without precedent or parallel in its history. It was based upon the conviction that the most effective way for the Nation to cope with the greatest military organization known to the world was to promptly concentrate whatever powers were necessary in the hands of the Chief Executive. Congress at the time could not have escaped the realization that no man or group of men could organize and mobilize the energies and resources of the Nation without making some mistakes.

I speak with confidence that none will question or contradict the assertion, that the President has as strong an interest and as deep a desire to promote the prosecution of the war as any Member of this body. Our acts must be in response to his requests and suggestions. His acts give assurance that he is calling to the support of the Government every available resource that is within his power of command. He has appointed his political rival during the last campaign, an able lawyer of great experience and reputation in such work, to make an investigation of the aircraft production, and has given him authority to make such investigation thorough and complete. He has called to the service of the Government two of the leading business men of the country to take charge of the work of aircraft production. He has called other leading business men of the country to take charge of other war activities—all with the purpose and to the end of producing the greatest efficiency and dispatch in war operations.

The people know these facts and under such circumstances they are impatient of anything that does not speed our war activities while the Nation is facing the gravest crisis in its history. No considerable number of people of any section of this country or of any political party want the Senate of the United States used as a sounding board for objectors or critics or disappointed promoters who wish to assail those who bear the burden of directing the conduct of the war. The people do not want the Government assailed; they want it supported. They want what the Constitution contemplates—a more perfect union, in order to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare and make secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity; and they want it now. The people have in their minds the one great purpose which has been set forth by the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy in language that will live through all the annals of recorded time. The winning of the war is the consuming purpose of the Nation.

To the President we have given the greatest power for waging war that has ever been vested in one man in the history of the world. On him we have placed the greatest responsibility that living man has ever carried. In him to-day is reposed the greatest confidence by the greatest number of free people in the greatest crisis for free institutions that any individual has ever possessed. Since I am so recently from the ranks of the people, I feel I can speak with perfect confidence of the spirit of the people of my State. The people of Missouri have confidence in Woodrow Wilson, and they are looking to Congress, and they feel it is the duty of Congress, to which the people will hold us to strict account, to give him all the cooperation and support within our power to enable him to meet and carry the responsibility which Congress, with the full approval of the people, has imposed upon him. They believe he understands and appreciates the issues and problems of this war from the standpoint of this Nation better than any other living man, and they believe that he is in a position to formulate and carry out a constructive policy in the execution of our war program to ultimate victory and peace.

The great question which now confronts our Nation and which is uppermost in the minds of all thoughtful Americans is, What policy shall we adopt; what road shall we travel which will bring us victory? It is our most solemn duty to most seriously consider all that we do with the questions which come before us to ascertain how we can best further the interest of the Nation and contribute most effectively to the winning of the war. If our force is to be most effective it must be put forth with the most possible speed, for time is a fundamental element of military accomplishment. This war must be won by this Nation and its associates for the preservation of all that is good in present civilized society—and it will be won. We have the resources, materials, and men with which the war must be waged; but materials and men will not win the war unless they are directed to the business of carrying on the war by an organization equal to the task of applying them most effectively against the enemy organized and trained for the purpose of making war and conquering the world. The warlike and heroic spirit of our people has already been reinvigorated and recreated, and they stand ready to meet the issue with their blood and their treasure; but this is not enough. The organization equal to this task is not merely an organization of men to lead armies and to transport supplies and to raise money with which to finance our activities. The organization which we must have is an organization that will bring to the work of carrying on the war the full support of all our resources of capital and labor and military man power backed by all social, economic, and financial force of the Nation directed to a single purpose. With Germany war is a highly developed technical and scientific business. To meet this enemy we must, for the time being, become a military people, and incorporate into our national life military methods. This involves radical change—sacrifice of every character, discipline of the most rigid and exacting kind, and a complete dedication of our lives to the organization and operation of a military power of sufficient strength to carry us to victory. No nation in history ever responded more nobly to the call of its Government to meet the emergencies of war than has ours.

The American people are not indifferent to this situation. They are aroused to the peril of this crisis. But under the stress of such desperate circumstances the spirit of the people must be regarded with jealous consideration, for that spirit is vital to every phase of the situation. The morale of the civil population is scarcely less important than the morale of our military forces in the fields. Attention must be constantly given to the problem of keeping the spirit of our people and their confidence and faith in the Government up to the point where that spirit and confidence stands as a firm foundation for the organization through which our men and material resources are directed to the task in hand.

There is no merit in "supporting the President" by opposing what he tries to do or attempting to show that it should have been done in some other way or by belittling and denouncing those upon whom he relies in conducting the war. The leading spirit of our powerful and ruthless enemy, the genius who, more than any other single man, has kept the German people steadfast even to the support of a selfish and iniquitous Government, has not been unmindful of preserving the spirit of his people for the support of an autocratic government of a people schooled in servile submission to that autocracy. More than a year ago Gen. Ludendorff said in a message which was sent to the Reichstag:

> We shall accomplish our enormous task if we feel behind us a united German people full of faith and ceasing to divide itself in vain discussion.

To say that we are fighting to make the world safe for democracy is but to say that democracy to-day is on trial. Will democratic government stand the test of war? Will a democratic people keep up a spirit and support the Government strong enough to wage war against autocracy? That is the question before us to-day. A democratic form of government is recognized as the best form of government for a free and enlightened people in time of peace. But the argument that has been waged against it through the centuries is that it will not stand the test of war.

War necessarily requires centralized power, and the framers of our Constitution, recognizing this not merely as a theory but as a fact, adapted our Government to the exigencies of war, and under provisions of the Constitution, Congress has centralized great power in the hands of the President for the conduct of the war in which we are now engaged. That power must not now be taken away or impaired by delay in giving to the President all the resources and authority that may be needed at any time in carrying out executive plans. This war must be conducted and directed by the Executive and not by parliamentary authority. I would not take away any constitutional rights of Congress, but in time of war different provisions of the Constitution are employed than in time of peace. The greatest expounder of the Constitution who ever lived, John Marshall, said:

> The nature of the Constitution requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.

I maintain that a democratic form of government can meet conditions of war and adapt the forces and agencies of the Nation to those conditions. The great outlines and the important objects of the Constitution can be protected if the minor ingredients which compose those objects are made to conform to the conditions of war. Democratic government is not only the most successful form of government for an enlightened people in time of peace, but under proper interpretation and administration it will stand every test of war and will protect its people in every crisis.

I have great faith in our Constitution; I have no fear that it will be distorted or destroyed by legislation in time of war. I am as jealous to preserve the Constitution as any living man. The only sure way to preserve our Constitution is to win this war.

The Constitution of the United States was not designed by its authors to hamper the development of the Nation or to obstruct its operations in a great emergency. One of its chief objects is to provide for a common defense. We are now engaged in its defense against a ruthless and powerful foe. The Hun is at our gates. We must fight to conquer. We must command all the resources of the Nation to the support of our Commander in Chief that he may lead us to victory and peace. In spirit and action we must be responsive to the call of this crisis and adapt ourselves to the imperative conditions that confront us.

Mr. CUMMINS. I send to the desk an amendment, which at the proper time I shall propose to the resolution now pending. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by making that part after line 20, page 2, read as follows:

> That no Senator shall occupy more than 1 hour and 30 minutes in debate on any bill or resolution and not more than 20 minutes on any amendment proposed thereto: Provided, That the Senate upon request may enlarge the time by a majority vote, the question to be decided without debate: And provided further, That when an amendment is pending a Senator may use all or any part of his time allowed for debate upon the bill or resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for an hour and a quarter, he said:

Mr. President, I may not be able to finish this evening, and if the Senator in charge of the resolution wishes it to go over until to-morrow, I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator desires to take up the question to-morrow, I am perfectly willing to move an adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 8, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 7, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our hearts instinctively turn to Thee, Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, source of every noble impulse, high resolve, and earnest desire. We thank Thee that we are privileged to think our own thoughts, to act our own desires, and feel the thrill of an approving conscience, as we strive to preserve and advance the civilization of our day. To overcome one wrong, to encourage one drooping soul is a joy beyond compare.

We thank Thee that our Republic with our allies is engaged in a gigantic struggle for humanity, to save it from autocracy, militarism, and brute force. Protect our soldiers and sailors who are fighting for liberty; guide their commanders and give them a victory for peace and humanity, and unborn generations will praise Thee, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of House resolution 369, authorizing the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate the Bureau of Indian Affairs and branches, from the Committee on Indian Affairs to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. What did the gentleman say it was about?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It directs an investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to change the reference of House resolution 369 from the Committee on Indian Affairs to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIAN FUNDS HELD IN STATE AND NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back House resolution 322, requesting certain information from the Secretary of the Interior, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 322.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, information as to the amount of money on deposit in State and national banks on April 1, 1918, belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in the State of Oklahoma and the Osage Tribe of Indians in the State of Oklahoma and to individual members of said tribes of Indians, the name and address of each of said banks and the amount on deposit in each bank and the rate of interest paid by each bank.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Reserving the right to object, which I do not expect to do——

Mr. WALSH. If it is a privileged resolution, you do not have to have unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is a privileged resolution.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I am to have 40 minutes?

The SPEAKER. That is subject to the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. This is a privileged matter, and such matters are always excepted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9959). It is a general pension bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9959, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9959) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is a House bill, with Senate amendment, and the gentleman moves to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman can move the previous question.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment, and I move the previous question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask if the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. In the first place, consent is desired. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to concur in the Senate amendment to the House bill and moves the previous question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely desire to ask the gentleman, so that the House can understand, whether the amendment in which he wishes to concur is the so-called Smoot amendment?

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is the Smoot amendment, increasing Civil War soldiers' pensions, with which the gentleman wants to concur?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH. The bill in its present form is what might be called the Smoot-Bland bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Where do you get the Bland?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen ought not to ask such questions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves the previous question on the motion to concur.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to concur.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, so long as there is objection to this increase on the part of some, I suggest the advisability of having a roll call. I make the point of no quorum on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of concurring will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 69, answered "present" 1, not voting 166, as follows:

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. ROWE.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. HILLIARD. I am informed and believe that if present, he would vote "yea," and therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEELE; but I am sure that if he were present he would vote for this bill, and therefore I desire to break my pair and have him paired with some one else on this vote. I have voted "yea" and wish to allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. WASON is unavoidably absent this morning. If present, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. ASHBROOK. My colleague Mr. BRUMBAUGH is absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to make a very brief statement. Members are getting into the habit of announcing how their colleagues would vote if they were here. How do they know how their colleague would vote?

Mr. BUTLER. Did the Speaker put that question to me?

The SPEAKER. No; I am not talking about you, because you had a pair; but we are gradually drifting into this habit, and sometimes 6 or 8 or 10 Members announce how their colleagues would vote, when their colleagues out in Ohio or Massachusetts or Mississippi could not possibly have known what the question was.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I speak with authority for my colleague Mr. BRUMBAUGH, because he votes for all pension bills, as I do.

The SPEAKER. But he might take a notion to vote against one.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I am sure he would not do that.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

On motion of Mr. ASHBROOK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on this pension bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT JUDGE, MISSISSIPPI (H. REPT. NO. 641, PT. 2).

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent to file instanter the views of the minority on the bill (S. 746) to provide for the appointment of a district judge in the northern and southern judicial districts in the State of Mississippi, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to file instanter the views of the minority on S. 746. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9506) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, and that the House disagree to all the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 9506, an omnibus pension bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent for a similar order on House bills 9641, 10843, 10924, and 11658, all of which are omnibus pension bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks for a similar order on the four bills which he mentions. The Clerk will report them by title.

The Clerk read the titles of the bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker appointed as conferees Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

BRIDGE ACROSS LITTLE PEEDEE RIVER, S. C.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4445) granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River. This is the usual bridge bill to replace a bridge at or near the point or place of the existing bridge.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to this bill, but I am anxious to expedite the special order for to-day, and I will have to object to any further unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the counties of Marion and Horry and the State highway commission of South Carolina and successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Little Peedee River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the site of the present bridge at Galivants Ferry, in the counties of Marion and Horry, in the State of South Carolina, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONTAGUE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar bill (H. R. 11552) was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1544) to provide for appeals from the decisions of boards of local inspectors of steam vessels, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota a member of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bills H. R. 7634, H. R. 8496, H. R. 9160, H. R. 9612, H. R. 10027, H. R. 10477, H. R. 10850, H. R. 11364, and H. R. 11663, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war in place of Mr. WALSH, excused.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 158. Joint resolution further extending the time within which the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River shall remain in effect.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 158. Joint resolution further extending the time within which the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River shall remain in effect; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the dead heroes of the Tuscania and their burial on the coast of Scotland.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech that my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], delivered at Atlantic City on the production of fire arms in the United States during the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech by his colleague, Col. TILSON. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 101, JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5558 and concur in the Senate amendment. The act is to amend section 101 of the judicial code.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request in regard to the bill H. R. 9864, an act to amend section 111 of the judicial code.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the effect of the amendments?

Mr. WEBB. The way the House passed the bill it amended only half of the section, 100. The Senate rewrites the whole section. It is a matter of taste and form.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In each instance it is merely a clerical change.

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely; no material change at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pension bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

PLATINUM, IRIDIUM, AND PALLADIUM.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] is recognized for 40 minutes by special order of the House.

PLATINUM.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the war has been in progress for over a year, and during that period of time I have supported in my votes in this House the activities of every war board. I propose now to criticize one of these boards—the War Industries Board. But I propose that my criticism shall be constructive. I intend to discuss in the time so generously allotted to me the subject of platinum, iridium, and palladium.

Modern wars can not be fought without platinum. In the present war that group of nations whose supply of platinum is inadequate will be compelled to submit to an inglorious peace. We can send abroad 10,000,000 of the youth of the land most carefully trained, but without platinum they could accomplish nothing. Explosives can not be manufactured without the use of sulphuric and nitric acids, and sulphuric and nitric acids can not be manufactured without ample supplies of platinum.

Nitrogen-fixing industries, for which we are preparing in this country, can not be operated successfully without platinum, and the millions we may expend in the construction of plants for extracting nitrogen from the air to be used in the manufacture of explosives will be absolutely wasted unless we have ample supplies of platinum. Without the use of platinum the extraction of nitrogen from the air is impossible.

Ignition points in airplanes must be manufactured out of platinum. No other metal has sufficient heat-resisting qualities. Platinum is absolutely necessary in the manufacture of pyrometers, and pyrometers are necessary in all steel treatments. No guns can be made without the use of pyrometers, and the use of platinum as a catalyst in the manufacture of sulphuric and nitric acids for explosives is absolutely necessary.

It was apparent when this war started that we could not fight it to a successful conclusion without an ample supply of platinum.

FIRST EFFORT TO CONSERVE PLATINUM.

To-day it is estimated that 50 per cent of the platinum used in the United States is used in the jewelry industry. A few weeks after our entry in the present war, on the 21st day of May, 1917, I supported on this floor an amendment to the war-revenue bill proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], in which he sought to tax jewelry composed in whole or in part of platinum 250 per cent. The proposition was defeated by the jewelers' vigilance committee. I made a speech on the floor favoring the amendment. The gentleman from Ohio addressed the committee, also, calling attention to the necessity for the conservation of platinum.

The Jewelers' Vigilance Committee was organized about the time of our entry into the world war for the avowed purpose of protecting jewelers of the country in the manufacture and sale of luxuries against war taxes that might be deemed by them to be excessive, and the first thing the vigilance committee did was to establish here in this Capital the most forceful and the most aggressive lobby I have ever seen in the city of Washington.

They represented that we got our supply of platinum from Russia; that Russia was our ally in this war; that she would soon permit unrestricted platinum shipments to the United States. They insisted that we had all the platinum we needed for war purposes, and they plausibly called attention to resolutions adopted by the jewelers' organizations in which they pledged that the supplies of platinum would be materially augmented; that the jewelry trade would discourage the use of nonessential platinum findings and parts of jewelry. They pledged themselves to the proposition of assisting the Government in bringing the war to a successful conclusion, and on this floor the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], who represents the city where the platinum industry of this country centers, read into the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, addressed to Mr. Rothschild, of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee, commending the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee for their patriotic stand, and this letter from the Secretary of Commerce contained the statement that no campaign for the conservation of platinum was needed further than the jewelry trade had already voluntarily made, as expressed in the resolutions to which I have just called attention, and the letter from the Secretary of Commerce contains the further statement that the promises of the jewelers and the campaign they proposed to make met with the entire approval of his department. As a result of this letter, and as a result of the efforts of the lobby maintained by the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee, the effort at that time to conserve platinum by taxing platinum jewelry failed.

JEWELERS' VIGILANCE COMMITTEE AND THE 400 JEWELERS WHO SUSTAIN THEM.

More than four years have elapsed since this awful world war started, but during that period of time no nation engaged in this war has produced profiteers more unpatriotic, whose efforts have been more unconscionable than the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee and the 400 jewelers' establishments in the United States which have sustained them with funds. Fifty per cent of our platinum supply each year is used in the manufacture of jewelry.

In a report made by the chairman of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee and published in the Jewelers' Circular-Weekly, of April 10, 1918, he states that the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee took up the platinum matter at the request of the platinum manufacturers, and his report shows that the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee was organized with the entry of the United States into this world war. He refers to the efforts of the former chairman, Mr. Rothschild, and the powerful representative committee which came to Washington to defeat the amendment to the revenue bill I have been discussing. He states they kept in constant touch with the Internal-Revenue Commissioner's Department; that all other matters coming before the vigilance committee than this were postponed; that the effort to defeat this amendment imposed a large expense, which was met by contributions of large and small amounts from over 400 persons and firms interested in the jewelry industry, and notwithstanding the large expense connected with the lobby they maintained he insisted that they still have left a nucleus for a fighting fund. During this fight against the attempt to conserve platinum he states the directors and the committees had 61 meetings, of which number 16 meetings were held by the platinum committee. Their legislative committee had 2 meetings and the taxing committee had 12 meetings. There were 10 mass meetings of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee with the trade at large on the subject of platinum and on the subject of jewelry—six of them were on taxing matters; two of them were held on the subject of platinum alone.

In addition to the members of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee, these meetings were attended by representatives of 832 firms. They sent out over 1,700 letters, circulars, announcements, and so forth, through the mails. There were 445 telegrams, the shortest of which contained 42 words and the longest 708 words. This long telegram was sent to 11 firms. They made 14 trips to Washington and other trips to other places and 115 members of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee made these trips.

I submit that this report, which anyone can read, describes the activities of the most vigorous lobby which ever infested this Capital. In their unpatriotic efforts they won, and they are still winning victories, and every victory they win is a victory for the German Emperor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did the gentleman state that 50 per cent of the supply of platinum is still used in the manufacture of jewelry?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then the alleged efforts of these gentlemen to prevent the use of platinum in jewelry have certainly not been very successful.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. They certainly have not been very successful, and they evidently did not intend to be successful along the lines the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. PLATT. As a matter of fact, is not jewelry made from platinum about the ugliest looking stuff that a person could wear?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Well, that is a matter of taste. Platinum was never considered desirable for wear as jewelry until it was worth more than gold.

PROPAGANDA OF THE JEWELERS AND THEIR VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

The promised efforts of the jewelers of the country through their vigilance committee to conserve platinum failed miserably. Platinum continued to increase in value until to-day the Government has placed a value on it of $105 per ounce, and as it increased in value its use as jewelry increased. Those jewelers who held the platinum stocks of the country and those dealers in platinum who held large stocks, without effort on their part, made enormous sums of money, and while pretending to be discouraging the use of platinum they compelled its use by discouraging the use of substitutes.

WHITE GOLD.

White gold is used as a substitute for platinum. It requires an acid test to tell the difference, but the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee held a meeting and passed a resolution early this year, denouncing the use of white gold as a substitute for platinum, and requiring that in the future whenever white gold was used in jewelry the letter "W" should be stamped on all articles in which this metal was used. They violently assailed the manufacturing chemists of the country, and they attributed the fight for the conservation of platinum made on this floor by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and myself, to the efforts of the chemical interests of the country, and Mr. Rothschild, at the convention of the annual State Retail Jewelers' Association, is quoted in the Jewelers' Circular-Weekly of May 30, 1917, as saying:

The selfish chemical interests which had started this attack on our industry with the avowed and shameless purpose of bearing down the price of platinum began a misleading press campaign—

Which he said resulted in the attempt to put a prohibitive war tax on platinum jewelry, which the platinum committee—was happily in a position to frustrate by the timely presentation of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, which was read on the floor of the House of Representatives, defeating this effort to tax platinum jewelry out of existence.

On the 3d day of April of this year the Jewelers' Circular attacked the women of the country, and, among other things, said:

The platinum situation in the jewelry trade is not satisfactory. The propaganda of the women fanatics asking the public to give up platinum jewelry has not been contradicted by Government officials.

On the 1st day of May of this year the magazine Vogue, an expensive magazine which circulates among the ultra fashionable set in the United States, and whose columns are largely composed of jewelers' advertisements, contained an article under the heading "The bride has a thousand jewels," in which the public are advised to buy platinum jewelry. The proper military engagement ring which is "patriotic, without being conspicuous," must have a graceful platinum setting. It must be a "ring engraved all around its platinum circle with stars," and the article proceeds to say that if she is to be the bride of the uniformed fiancé, a service pin is essential. The article deplores the plain character of service pins, but proceeds to say that "when they are made of rubies, diamonds, and sapphires, set in platinum, they are very beautiful."

On the 15th day of last month the Jewelers' Circular-Weekly, on page 105, contained an article with the heading, "The absurdity of curtailing sales of luxuries." The article occupies over a column of space, insists that attempts to economize on luxuries are attempts on the part of the unthinking, and they argue in this article that the men and women who work in factories are obtaining to-day large wages for the first time in their lives, and they are working not for the purpose of laying up money, not for the purpose of purchasing the necessaries of life, but they are working in order to enable them to have the opportunity of purchasing luxuries, such as jewelry. I quote from the article.

They do not want money as money; they want the money for what it will buy. It is the luxury that they have craved for years and one that they could not get, that they demand now as a compensation for their work.

I now hereby most solemnly promise that, so far as I am concerned, when the new war-revenue bill makes its appearance it will contain an item which will impose a war tax so high on jewelry composed in whole or in part of platinum as to make its use impossible in the manufacture of jewelry during the period of this war at least. [Applause.] Since the war started no sufficient measures for the conservation of platinum have been taken. With each passing month it has increased in value in the hands of profiteers. It was not desirable as jewelry until it exceeded in value gold, and since then it has become exceedingly desirable as jewelry, and the rich are evidently demanding platinum jewelry merely for the reason that to-day platinum, iridium, and palladium are the most valuable of all the precious metals.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman that we do not wait until it reaches the floor, but put such a provision in in committee, and I think we will be able to do it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. And if we do not get it there we will try it on the floor.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why not make it a felony to use platinum for the manufacture of jewelry also?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It ought to be made a felony during this war at least. It ought never to be used under any circumstances in the manufacture of jewelry.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. Has anyone in the War Department or any branch of the executive departments communicated to the Congress up to this time these startling facts which the gentleman now discloses?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one further question? Does not the gentleman think that Congress should be able to assume that if the Kaiser is winning victories in this way—if these startling facts exist—the War Department would know what these factors in the production of combustibles are, and the War Department should advise the Congress speedily of such a condition?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Well, I am doing my best to advise Congress.

Mr. SANFORD. I fully sympathize with the gentleman's contention——

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I do not control the War Department, and I am not criticizing any department of this Government in this address.

Mr. SANFORD. I hope the gentleman will understand that I am not attempting to criticize anyone; but it seems to me Congress should be able to assume, if we are being beaten in this way, that the War Department, which has charge of this knowledge, should give us knowledge at once.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. This is a matter of general information, and the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. FOSTER], has presented a bill from his committee which has for its purpose the conservation of platinum hereafter to be mined in the United States and the development of the platinum industry in the United States. Am I correct?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and to give the Government absolute control of all platinum in the United States now or that might be brought in by importation.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman state where that bill is?

Mr. FOSTER. In another branch of this Congress, at the north end of the Capitol.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman know when it is likely to pass there?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know, and I can not say.

OUR SOURCE OF PLATINUM.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Nearly all of the world's supply of platinum comes from Russia. Even at the time of our entry into this war Russia had prohibited the exportation of platinum to any country in the world, including the United States, and of course the exportation of platinum from Russia to any other country than Germany now is an impossibility. Germany controls the platinum supply of Russia to-day, and Russia has supplied, and is still supplying, nearly all the platinum in use in the world. We produce in the United States less than 1 per cent of our supply of platinum. Ten per cent of the world's supply of platinum comes from the Republic of Colombia, but on account of the unfortunate incidents of a few years ago the Republic of Colombia is not particularly friendly to the United States at the present time, and even if with her generous and enthusiastic cooperation we succeeded in getting all of the platinum she had to offer to the world, the supply we would obtain would be negligible.

Iridium and palladium occur with platinum and are used for the purpose of hardening platinum. We are attempting now weekly to commandeer these metals also and have fixed a price on iridium of $175 per ounce and a price on palladium of $130 per ounce. These metals are used with platinum to harden it and are just as necessary as platinum.

There is published in the current number of the Journal of Industrial and Engineering Chemistry a most interesting article on the subject of platinum, under the heading "The Great Gamble." I do not propose to insert this article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I will see that each Member of this House obtains a copy of it.

Dr. Charles H. Herty, the editor of this paper, publishes a letter of recent date in this article from Dr. George Otis Smith, Director of the United States Geological Survey, in which he states that "the fact that there is a serious shortage in the platinum supply is beyond question." I quote from his letter:

A Hoover is needed to conserve platinum, lest our military program halt, simply because our acid works can not meet their demand. Of course, Mr. Editor, I indorse your protest against a halfway or a 75 per cent, or even a 99 per cent, restriction of nonessential use of platinum. No American with his eyes open to the facts can do less than stand behind you.

This interesting article also contains a letter from Dr. Van H. Manning, Director of the Bureau of Mines, in which he states that "the artificial value placed upon platinum to-day is due entirely to its use in jewelry, an entirely unessential use, even in times of peace." This letter contains the statement that there are other white metals equally valuable for the setting of gems, except that they are not as costly as platinum. The same article contains a letter dated May 15, 1918, and signed by J. N. Hill, the geologist in charge of our platinum statistics, in which he states that "the platinum situation is far worse than it was six months ago, and at that time a shortage of platinum metals for war purposes was indicated." He states in this letter that to permit the utilization of 25 per cent of the stocks held by manufacturing jewelers at the present time appears "to be the height of folly, since our stocks are low, the demands for war purposes increasing with each addition to our Army, and our source of new materials strictly limited."

The Scientific American of May 18, 1918, calls attention to the platinum shortage and criticizes the Association of Manufacturing Jewelers, who attempt to minimize it, and describes their efforts as being due to motives wholly selfish. The article goes on to say that, considering our basic war needs for platinum, the purchasing of jewelry made from this unattractive metal can not be considered as anything other than the height of unpatriotism. This article appeared on the 18th day of May, 1918. On the 16th day of May, 1918, Mr. Eisenhower, speaking for the firm of J. E. Caldwell & Co., and for jewelers generally in the United States, is quoted in the Philadelphia Ledger as saying that "25 per cent of the reserve stock of platinum, which has already been turned over to the Government, is enough to fill all our war needs for five years to come."

I have called attention, I think, to sufficient evidence to show the absolute need for platinum and the lack of patriotism of those who advocate its use at the present time for other than necessary war purposes. I now propose to discuss briefly the inefficient attempts of our War Industries Board to conserve this important metal.

The conservation of platinum and iridium and palladium has been by the War Industries Board placed in charge of Mr. C. H. Conner. For the first time since war started, I am on this floor criticizing any agency of this Government. I have supported every war board in its activities to the very best of my ability, and I do not intend now to indulge in any character of criticism of the activities of this board, which has rendered most valuable and patriotic service, except constructive criticism. I do not question the patriotism of Mr. Conner, nor the patriotism of any member of this board. Their patriotism and their devotion to duty is beyond question. They have, however, had exceedingly bad advisers, and have been influenced by the advice received from the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee and from another source which I will mention later on. I have called attention sufficiently to the unpatriotic efforts of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee to indicate that their advice ought not to be seriously considered in an important matter of this kind, and yet if we are to believe the statements made by the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee in their trade papers, they have been in constant communication with Mr. Conner and the War Industries Board, and have been assisting the War Industries Board in enforcing the recent ineffective commandeering orders.

Several attempts have been made by this board, all of them wholly ineffective, wholly insufficient to conserve these important metals. For months, and until the last 60 days, the War Industries Board evidently depended entirely upon the promises of the large jewelers of the country to furnish the Government with sufficient platinum for war purposes. Out of 5,000 ounces of platinum, which they admit to have been in the hands of manufacturing jewelers a few weeks ago, only 500 ounces were turned over to the Government at the request of the War Industries Board. Two or three orders have been made within the last two months commandeering platinum. The first order, according to the Jewelers' Circular-Weekly, applied only to a few platinum refiners. Since that time a more sweeping order has been made, but the last order, made less than a month ago, permitted the sale of platinum articles in the hands of jewelers and manufacturers still to be made. It did not attempt to reach manufactured platinum, and it may be fairly assumed that a large part of the stock is now in the shape of manufactured platinum. In fact, the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee have been warning manufacturing jewelers that pure platinum would be commandeered for months. Even now 25 per cent of the platinum in the hands of manufacturing jewelers is exempt from the effects of the order, and the same exemption applies to palladium and iridium, and jewelers are advised by the War Industries Board that other releases or waivers are now being furnished so as not to disturb the platinum industry. The War Industries Board have evidently followed the advice of the Jewelers' Vigilance Committee. The statement is made that 10,000 men are engaged in the manufacture of platinum jewelry, and this industry must not be disturbed and these men thrown out of employment. At the present time, with submarines at our gates, with nearly a million young men in the trenches in France, confronted as we are with the possibility of a long war which will tax our resources to the utmost, the throwing of these 10,000 men out of employment is absolutely a negligible matter. They are evidently skilled mechanics—their services are in demand in war industries, and throwing them out of employment, if the industry should be stopped, as I predict it will be soon, will be rendering a great war service. They will not be out of employment long—employment awaits all mechanics in our great war industries at high wages.

I desire now to call attention to another source of advice upon which the War Industries Board has depended. I am unwilling to believe that they fully understand the influences which surround the adviser upon whom they have depended since the organization of this important war board.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed until he concludes his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed until he concludes. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object and do not intend to unless the gentleman's remarks will take too much time.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will be through in 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. The rehabilitation bill is waiting.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I know it; and I will get through in just a few minutes.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman is correct, this is to prevent the necessity of the rehabilitation of future victims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHARLES ENGELHARD.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The German firm of W. C. Heraeus has its headquarters in Hanau, Germany. It has a branch in the United States, controlled by Charles Engelhard, who has his office at 30 Church Street, New York City, and who advertised, just before our entry into the war, in American trade papers that, doing business as Charles Engelhard, he is a branch of this German firm. This German firm is among the largest dealers in platinum in the world, occupying a position in the platinum industry throughout the world almost similar to the position always occupied prior to the war of the German firm of Hagenback in the wild-animal industry of the world.

Charles Engelhard was born in Hanau, Germany, of German parentage. He speaks English imperfectly, and came here some 25 years ago. He married the daughter of this same W. C. Heraeus, and she has six brothers in the German Army. I have with me a complete copy of a card signed by Charles Engelhard and filed recently with the Chemists' Club of New York, which contains the following statement:

I am personally with the War Industries Board, Washington, D. C., every Tuesday, to consult as regards platinum matters.

He also states on this card that his business is platinum.

There are five firms which control 80 per cent of the platinum supplies of the United States:

Baker & Co., of Newark, N. J.;
The American Platinum Works, also of Newark, N. J.;
The Irvington Smelting & Refining Co., Irvington, N. J.;
The Hanovia Chemical Co.; and
Charles Engelhard, doing business as Charles Engelhard.

All of these firms are controlled absolutely by Charles Engelhard, and every one of these firms has its office at 30 Church Street, New York City. In other words, the office of every one of these firms is also the office of Charles Engelhard.

Just a moment ago Mr. Baruch, the chairman of the War Industries Board, who knew I was going to make this speech, called me up over the telephone—and in justice to him I want to say that he said that Charles Engelhard was not officially connected with the War Industries Board. I have not said that he was. I have merely said that he claims—and this is the claim he made just a few weeks ago—that a part of his business was to come down here to Washington every Tuesday to confer with the War Industries Board on the subject of platinum; and I know that yesterday afternoon between the hours of 3 and 4 o'clock Charles Engelhard told a representative of the Alien Property Custodian that he was still the adviser of the War Industries Board as to platinum. Now, whether they have followed his advice or not, they could not have done worse than they have, and you would expect this kind of advice they have been following from this source and from the profiteering jewelers of this country.

Charles Engelhard lives at 535 Park Avenue, New York City, in the fashionable residence section of New York. It would require millions of dollars to swing the business of these four firms, and yet the commercial agencies of the country are unable to obtain from Charles Engelhard a satisfactory statement as to his business, or as to the source of the large sums of money he must have in order to control the platinum business of the United States. Recently a young man representing one of the great commercial agencies succeeded in passing the outer barriers and in getting into the inner office of Charles Engelhard, hoping to find him there and to obtain from him personally a financial statement. He did not find him there, but he did find there apparently in control of the inner office a German alien by the name of Von Broek, who at that time received from unknown sources frequently sums of money usually amounting to $6,000, which sums he disbursed among Germans who were out of employment on account of war conditions. From the firm of Baker & Co. a suspected German alien was recently taken and interned at Ellis Island, N. Y., where Von Broek is now interned.

I have called attention, I think, to sufficient facts, and these facts can not be controverted, to create the strong suspicion that the platinum industry of the United States may have been controlled during the year that we have been engaged in this war by Germany. In order to be perfectly fair, I desire to state that Charles Engelhard claims to be naturalized, but he was not naturalized, according to his own statement, until 1906, and at that time Germany was actively preparing in so many different ways for her entry into this war. I have not myself investigated the question as to whether or not he is naturalized. I am assuming that his statement in this particular is true.

I think I have called attention to sufficient facts to show that the War Industries Board has been badly advised, and if I succeed in turning the light of publicity upon the unfortunate situation which confronts us as a Nation in the matter of platinum, I may succeed in accomplishing a real conservation in time of war, not of a part, but of all of this most valuable basic war metal.

And now, in conclusion I desire to call attention to just one other fact. Most of you are familiar with the Holmes electric protector, and you are familiar with its uses. It is used to protect—against thieves—valuables, money, and jewels. Its use for the purpose of protecting books and papers against thieves is rare indeed. Books of a business firm, their letter files and papers are seldom in need of electric protectors. This office, however, of Charles Engelhard at 30 Church Street, New York, and all the books and papers in the office are protected with a Holmes electric protector. I do not desire to comment upon this interesting fact except to say that the books and the papers of the disloyal I. W. W. organizations of the United States which were recently seized by our efficient Secret Service agents were not protected by a Holmes electric protector. If they had been contained in offices in the great city of New York, and were protected in this way, their seizure would have been impossible, for reasons every Member of this Congress well understands.

I do not desire to further comment upon the advisers of the War Industries Board. I have called attention to who they are, and have called attention to enough facts connected with their activities to show that bad advice with reference to platinum was to be expected from these sources, and I have called attention to enough facts with reference to platinum to show that the War Industries Board, in its conservation efforts and in its insufficient commandeering orders, has had bad advice, and unless sufficient commandeering orders are made at once the matter ought to be taken completely out of their hands and turned over to some competent governmental control or agency.

THE ONLY AGENCY AT WORK IN THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CONSERVATION OF PLATINUM.

It is interesting in this connection to note that the women of the country have established an organization for the conservation of platinum which they call the Women's National League for the Conservation of Platinum. Mrs. Ellwood B. Spear, of 27 Walker Street, Cambridge, Mass., is president, and the council is made up of vice presidents from a number of States. They are issuing appeals to the women of the country to cease the purchase of platinum jewelry, and at their own expense they are sending out literature on the subject. Congress and its committees have yielded to the persuasive power of an unpatriotic lobby. The War Industries Board, charged with the important patriotic duty of conserving this important metal, has failed in the discharge of this important duty. The Jewelers' Vigilance Committee and the 400 important firms and individuals who contribute liberally to their support have been maintaining an expensive publicity campaign to convince the country that conservation of platinum is not necessary. The facts show that they have been unpatriotic profiteers. No language that can be phrased can be made too strong in characterizing their selfish, immoral methods, and the results they have already obtained are appalling; but while all this has been going on and these agencies of the Government have failed the women of the National League for the Conservation of Platinum at their own expense have been carrying on a campaign of publicity and education along patriotic lines. They have been doing what they could, and have been termed by the jewelers' lobby an organization of "women fanatics."

In conclusion, I want to say that I have merely presented facts, and I most respectfully submit to this body that the time for the creation of a competent agency to take charge of this matter has come. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think this ought to be said in regard to the attitude of the Ways and Means Committee a year ago: At the time the amendment was introduced by myself the fact was that the committee had never given the question any attention, because the information showing the tremendous shortage of platinum and the necessity of some action did not come to me until after the bill was reported and under consideration. When I spoke to a number of my colleagues, they said that they did not feel that they ought to act as a committee with such little information, no information having come direct to the committee. At the psychological moment the letter from the Secretary of Commerce was read in the House, and it was not remarkable that many gentlemen felt that his view was entitled to more weight than mine.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I predict now that when the next revenue bill is reported there will be a tax, and if I can have my way it will be a thousand per cent on platinum used in jewelry. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman. We will be able to close the door before all the horses have been stolen. At the present time when our boys are fighting in France it is not a time to consider this one small industry. The only argument they use against the proposition to place a prohibitive tax on platinum jewelry is that from eight to ten thousand skilled mechanics will be thrown out of employment.

In view of the fact that we are preparing to send more soldiers to France, in view of the fact that we are to have soon a million men in France, to be followed by another million, and another million, until 10,000,000 men are there, if necessary, in order to win the war, in view of the fact that on this day the war front has been moved closer to us—the war front to-day is just a few miles from the New Jersey coast—in view of these facts, this is not the time to talk about the rights of employment that 10,000 mechanics may have in this country in any industry.

The failure of our platinum supply for war purposes may result in a disaster to this country such as no man can imagine at the present time. Every time we send a hundred thousand more men to the battle fields of Flanders we need more platinum; every time we equip a hundred more aeroplanes we need more platinum; every time we build a tank we need more platinum; every time we manufacture a gun we need more platinum; every time we manufacture a shell we need more platinum; every time we manufacture additional supplies of explosives we need more platinum. Eight or ten thousand mechanics, skilled mechanics, will have no trouble at all in finding employment in war industries, and if the stoppage of the platinum-jewelry industry—an unessential industry—releases eight or ten thousand skilled mechanics to engage in war work, that of itself would be a sufficient reason for stopping it. But back of it are all the other reasons, and if we do not conserve these important metals, these three precious metals of the world, there may be disaster and defeat in store for the armies of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's statement. It has occurred to me how a high duty on platinum would prove a remedy, and then it occurred to me that the duty of 500 or 1,000 per cent might stop its importation, except by the Government, and the Government could bring it in free of duty or it could go into the Treasury.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Platinum ought to come in absolutely free; we need all we can get of these three metals. I am not advocating a duty; I am advocating a prohibitive tax on the manufacture of jewelry containing platinum in whole or in part, a tax so high that this kind of jewelry could not be manufactured.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman thinks that would control the price.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It would certainly make it much cheaper, according to the opinion of the experts, and it would also release 50 per cent of platinum used in jewelry.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman may be right, and if the Government would monopolize the imports of platinum and put on a high tax where it is used by individuals, that possibly might be a remedy.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I do not care how it is done; but the further manufacture of jewelry out of these basic war metals should be prevented at once, and all stocks of these metals should be taken over by the Government without delay, and jewelry in the hands of manufacturers containing platinum ought also to be taken over.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I will read to the gentleman from Illinois the amendment which I offered and which in my opinion is an absolutely sure way of preventing the use of platinum in jewelry. This amendment was offered to that section of the revenue bill which put a tax of 3 per cent on jewelry:

Upon jewelry composed in whole or in part of platinum sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, a tax equivalent to 250 per cent of the price for which it is sold.

In other words, in jewelry which had any platinum the manufacturer, producer, or importer would have to pay a tax of 250 per cent before he could sell it. If we put such a tax upon it, or one even higher, we will get at this situation.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to address the House for four minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

REHABILITATION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 4557.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the arrangements made with Judge TOWNER, who has charge of the bill on the Republican side of the House, and representing the Republican section of the committee, I shall for the present make a very brief preliminary statement with reference to this bill and then yield to the gentleman from Iowa, who, I understand, intends to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS, who on account of some personal arrangements will probably have to leave the city at an early hour. I shall not, therefore, as I would like to do, at the present time, undertake an anaysis or summary of the provisions of the bill. I feel sure that all of us since the beginning of this war have from time to time thought of the imperious and pressing necessity that would soon devolve upon the Congress to devise some practical ways and means for providing for the reeducation of those of our sailors and soldiers who were permanently disabled in body or in health as a result of their service in the war. It is a measure and a proposition that has enlisted the thoughtful consideration of some of the greatest constructive minds of the country, and I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that the bill as now presented represents, as I believe, the very best thought of the country upon the part of those, who by their qualifications, their study, and their experience, are best qualified to make recommendations and suggestions on this subject.

Some four or five months ago, at the instance of the Council of National Defense, a committee composed of a large number of gentlemen with special qualifications to pass upon this subject, met and had some preliminary discussions as to the fundamental and vital propositions that should be involved in the bill that should be passed by the Congress. Those gentlemen consisted of the Secretaries of War, Navy, Commerce, and Labor, the Director General of the Vocational Board, a representative from the Surgeon General's Office, and a great many other men who are deeply interested in the subject. As a result of their preliminary investigations and recommendations the committee finally sifted down to a smaller number, and then the bills were introduced in the Senate and the House by the respective chairmen of the Committees on Education, involving in the main the general principles that had been finally concurred in by the two respective committees of both bodies and which constitute the substance of the bill now offered for the consideration of this committee. The bill was up for debate several days in the Senate. Some minor objections were made to it, but it finally passed by a unanimous vote of the Senate and now comes up for consideration of the House by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Education.

I desire to commend to the consideration of the committee the report which has been filed in support of House bill 12212, which is the number of the House bill. I believe it is one of the most comprehensive and concrete reports from any committee that I have read. It was prepared at the request of the committee by Dr. FESS, who has made careful study of these propositions, and those gentlemen who are interested in the subject, if they will secure copies of the report, will find therein in concrete form the essential elements embodied in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, when we made the preliminary arrangements yesterday about going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, we did not reach any decision as to the time that should be consumed in general debate, but agreed that it might run along at the pleasure of the committee. I failed to reserve the remainder of my time, the hour allotted to me under the rules, when I took my seat a moment ago, and I desire to do that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves the remainder of his time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7796) to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REHABILITATION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] as he may desire in the presentation of the bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING], who wanted to make some statements to which I objected a while ago, because we had not yet gotten into the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I feel very grateful indeed for the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the committee for yielding to me at this time. I am glad to have the time now, before a technical discussion of the bill for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers is taken up, because I have no intention of discussing that legislation other than to say that it will receive my hearty support.

Mr. Chairman, the House has frequently during the progress of the war paused for a moment in its regular business to express its appreciation of some incident which has distinguished a community in its contribution to our war work. I ask the indulgence of the House this morning to refer briefly to such an event.

My State is known as the home of the Mormon people. In a former generation it was the popular thing here and elsewhere to speak in terms of condemnation of their religion, as well as to question their patriotism and their loyalty to our country.

However much men may have disagreed in the past about these questions, I think it will be conceded that no man has yet successfully challenged the broad statesmanship and breadth of vision of Brigham Young, one of the great leaders of these people.

This dauntless pioneer led into a trackless desert the men and women who, under his direction, laid securely the foundation of a great State. I rise this morning to speak of one very inconspicuous and minor evidence of this leadership. Brigham Young fostered and encouraged as one of the auxiliary organizations of the church the Woman's Relief Society. With the main purpose of that great organization—its charitable and educational work—I am not now concerned. These women were advised as one of their minor activities to store wheat, and it is of this rather unusual activity I wish to speak.

In the early days of Utah's history and in the humble beginning of the relief society, these women gleaned the harvest fields in order that no precious head of grain should be lost. Wheat was so precious to the pioneers that it was used as a medium of exchange. It was the standard of value by which other commodities were measured. They had little or no other currency. My own mother has related to me more than once her association with and cheerful participation in this work of gleaning the precious yellow grain.

Later on by purchase and donation these women added more rapidly to their store of wheat. As the stock grew it was moved from the small wooden granaries belonging to the local relief society organizations to great steel and cement elevators constructed for that purpose and controlled by the women themselves. From the beginning these women were taught that the time would come when every available pound of wheat would be needed to conserve the Nation's life and prevent famine and starvation. It has remained a strongly intrenched tradition with the women of this organization, and they believe it to be true to-day.

This spring, in April, there were in the elevators belonging to the Mormon women of Utah and other adjacent Western States 205,518 bushels of first-class milling wheat. Last month these devoted women felt that the time had come for them to use their precious savings of more than 60 years. Through the presidency of the Mormon Church every pound of this wheat was tendered to and accepted by the United States Food Administration for the use of the starving women and children among our allies, and for the use of our soldiers and sailors in the Army and Navy of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I had not thought of mentioning this incident until yesterday, when I received a letter from Mr. Herbert Hoover expressing the appreciation of his administration for the assistance rendered. Mr. Hoover's letter and my reply thereto are as follows:

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1918.

Hon. MILTON H. WELLING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WELLING: The recent action of the women of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, in Utah, in releasing wheat and flour for the use of our allies and our own soldiers abroad is so commendable that I wish to drop you this line merely to assure you of my appreciation of this service performed by the church.

It has given me pleasure to write about this matter to Joseph F. Smith, Anthon H. Lund, and C. W. Penrose, first presidency, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and to assure them of the renewed courage we get from this generous act, both because it yields a substantial addition of food sorely needed by our hard-pressed allies and also because the example is felt far outside the field of its immediate application.

Yours, faithfully, HERBERT HOOVER.

JUNE 6, 1918.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
United States Food Administrator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: May I thank you most sincerely for your favor of June 3, announcing the tender of a large quantity of wheat by the women of the Mormon Church to the war needs of our Nation and our allies.

I join with you in the thought that this action is a manifestation of patriotic service to our country in this crisis which deserves all praise.

Thanking you for your letter and assuring you of my desire to cooperate with you in your arduous duties, I have the honor to be Very sincerely, yours,

M. H. WELLING.

This 12,331,080 pounds of wheat so tendered to the cause of human liberty will not win the war, but it will save the lives of thousands who suffer for lack of bread to eat.

These women have with solemn pride given their sons to fight for the freedom of mankind. They now turn over to the uses of humanity these precious savings of more than a generation to bind up the broken hearted and bring back life to the helpless victims of this pitiless strife. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have been rather unusually interested in the outcome of this legislation not so much as to what action the House would finally take, for there can be no doubt of the final decision on the bill, but as to the expedition with which we might reach it in order that authority can be given to handle the cases that are coming to our shores. I mentioned sometime ago on the floor of the House of the incident of the Surgeon General's office without specific authority doing what appears to be necessary to meet the emergency in the belief that Congress would ratify anything reasonable that was done in this rehabilitation work, and the fact that the casualty lists are being published daily, which give to us startling facts as to the number of wounded among our soldiers. These facts pressed upon me very heavily, and that is why I may have seemed to have manifested some impatience over what ordinarily would not have been regarded as unnecessary delay, but which I thought was an unnecessary delay in reaching this bill, because of the emergency of this situation. The list that was given on June 5, as reported in the press, indicates 45 wounded soldiers that day and the number previously reported was 3,726. These soldiers, some of them are in Europe and some of them over here. The Government has utilized or is attempting to utilize the Walter Reed Hospital for this work of functional rehabilitation, and it proposes to use the hospital over here in Baltimore at Fort McHenry and the hospital down in Georgia at Fort McPherson. I understand steps are being taken to establish, all told, 11 such institutions. The necessity of legislation of this sort certainly is apparent without any sort of argument at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman his opinion of what the capacity of the 11 hospitals proposed will be?

Mr. FESS. I could not at this time say what the capacity will be. That, of course, will be chiefly for the functional rehabilitation and is not to be used for the real vocational training for which this bill provides.

Mr. MADDEN. That will be simply for the convalescent treatment?

Mr. FESS. The physical or functional rehabilitation.

Mr. MADDEN. During the period of convalescence?

Mr. FESS. Yes. Gentlemen of the Congress, the facts that we get from the belligerents and the number of wounded soldiers lead us to make general statements. Of course those statements will not be entirely accurate. We are told that 1 per cent of those who have been at the front have been wounded to such an extent that they would become subjects of rehabilitation. If we had a million this year, there will be 10,000, according to the statistics of the Canadian Government, subject to rehabilitation. Now, of course everybody knows that if we are entering upon open warfare such as in the last few days that that figure is going to be wonderfully increased.

Mr. TOWNER. May I suggest to my colleague that that is 10,000 every year?

Mr. FESS. Yes. It is stated in Canada about 50 per cent of them would be subject to medical treatment or rehabilitation and 50 per cent to surgical. We are told that the seriously disabled soldier is not so much a disability—for example, the dismembered, the legless or the armless or the eyeless soldier—but it is rather the one who suffers from shell shock or a nervous condition, the ailment of which does not appear to the open eye. That number is far in excess of those who will require the more spectacular treatment in the hospitals. Some Members saw the great film that was displayed here in the House Office Building by the courtesy of the Canadian commission, where was displayed the activity in the hospitals where physical rehabilitation took place, and also the vocational activity, where the training for a vocation took place, and it was a rather startling fact, although a welcome one, to recognize that practically not over 50 cases, all told, coming to them in Canada were cases where the eyesight was totally gone. There were great numbers, however, with no legs and no arms. The fact that we are getting back our wounded, and without a doubt great numbers in the near future, is upon us. The sentiment of the situation which appeals to us all, and which is the consideration in my mind, is, What can be done with the wounded, whether they are subject to rehabilitation or not?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman, if he can, tell us what the experience of Canada has been with respect to the number of men who have to be rehabilitated? They have only sent over less than 500,000 men to the other side. Now, how many have come back—what per cent?

Mr. FESS. I have figures in the report——

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will permit, the information shows that 1 per cent approximately of the total number of men engaged in the Canadian Army overseas were subjects for vocational rehabilitation.

Mr. TOWNER. But the gentleman from Illinois, I understand, wants to know how many were returned wounded out of 250,000 men who have been actually engaged in warfare on the front and in the trenches. Forty-one thousand were sent back. Forty-one thousand of the number actually engaged in warfare have been sent back wounded. Out of this number 26,000 have been sent for treatment to hospitals; others have been returned to their homes, and of that number 2,400, or 1 per cent, have been subject to vocational training. That is where the coefficient of 1 per cent is obtained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These are Canadian soldiers returned?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. So the wounded returned would amount to 18 per cent of the total?

Mr. TOWNER. Whatever the amount is.

Mr. MADDEN. Twenty-one thousand would be about that per cent.

Mr. FESS. As to the possibility of rehabilitation, the first example of all is given in the work done at Lyons, France, through the mayor of the city. He was assisted by the famous leader from Belgium upon the rehabilitation of the industrial crippled who happened to find his way to Lyons when cripples began to file through back from the front into that city. All of these belligerent countries began this work as voluntary effort, then it became a sort of semiofficial organization, and now I am glad to know that every belligerent country is dealing with it officially, as a governmental duty and function.

Dr. Amar, of France, has made the statement that fully 80 per cent of the people who are wounded can be rehabilitated. This is a thing that appeals to me, I think, beyond any other thought in connection with the war. We all associate with war the climax of the tragedy, which is death. Nothing do we cling to like life. And yet I believe that every Member here will agree that there are conditions under which a soldier may be placed that are worse than death. I think to come back home with a mind incoherent, so that consecutive thinking is impossible and with no longer the ability of control of mental powers, or a physical wreck, a man who before he became a soldier had a brilliant future, so far as promise could come from ability to do things, for such a young man to become a mere pitiful subject of public charity is deplorable. One of the most hopeless situations of all conception is a man placed in a position where he has no chance in life and must be regarded simply as human wastage. Especially is this true if he was a man of great promise when he responded to the call of his country. We find that that is unnecessary. There is now in progress, as has been conclusively demonstrated, such training in other countries that we find human wastage is being repaired and lost ability is being rationally utilized, and instead of energies totally lost because of a maimed condition, that individual comes home and has a promise that he will not only be again a citizen, independent in his relationship to the community, but, through a system of training, can look the world in the face and bid defiance to its thoughtless, if not heartless, attitude toward the cripple, because he has had a training of self-helpfulness that makes him absolutely independent of his situation.

I do not know anything that an individual could be so proud of as to be able to follow the advice of old ex-Gov. Gore, of Massachusetts, which he gave to the young collegian, Daniel Webster, who was about to leave college and go back home because the farm was mortgaged and he did not have the money and his parents could not take care of the farm. The old governor said:

> Go on and finish your work. What bread you eat let it be the bread of independence. Depend not upon the favor of any man.

I think that any individual, young, middle-aged, or old, who can realize that he has the qualifications and the opportunity for complete utilization of those qualifications, can look the world in the face and say, "I do not owe you anything," is the most self-respecting, and in the last analysis the most happy as well as deserving. This situation, in my judgment, gives a man a desirable place in a community. It makes him one of the most independent people and places him in the best condition of any citizen of his community.

The bill as it is written is based upon the principle that the soldier who was taken from his home—it might be without his consent, because his greatest allegiance is to his Government, or even as a volunteer—has been brought back in a crippled state, which without training would leave him in a hopeless condition the balance of his life, must be cared for, not as a subject of charity but as a subject to be trained for self-helpfulness by the Government whose honor he offered his life to defend. It is based upon the principle that when the soldier is wounded and brought back to the hospital to be healed, having been healed, the function of the Government is not yet completed; that he must be trained to do something—either to resume his former work or enter upon some new work.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ASWELL. That is just the point that occurred to my mind, that the most important thing for a wounded soldier is to have faith in the fact that he will be able to do something. Now, he needs that when he is wounded and while he is in the hospital. The point I wish you to make clear is this: Vocational education is one thing and rehabilitation is a vastly different thing, and I have doubt as to the Vocational Board being the best agency of the Government to do this work. For instance, you can not go back into the hospital and begin a vocational training or rehabilitation. Under this bill you must wait until he comes out of the hospital on the advice of the Surgeon General, and it seems to me this bill should be so amended that the soldier may get some inspiration and some hope and some direction while he is in the hospital.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield and let me break in with a word?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me the suggestion made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] is a good one, and I assume that, whatever the vocational education legislation is to be, when the wounded soldier is in the hospital for medical treatment the doctors will begin to train his mind for the vocational education which is to follow after he is able to resume some sort of activity.

Mr. ASWELL. That is just the point. The main object of the bill is the man.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I think I can entirely satisfy my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. ASWELL. One more question.

Mr. FESS. Let me suggest that I think when I discuss section 6 the gentleman will be entirely satisfied with the answer, because the very point he raises is the most delicate problem all along the way and has been gone into very thoroughly.

Now, the second question.

Mr. ASWELL. The second question is this. The board is a vocational board. It is a narrow board in a sense. It is for the specific vocational work. Now, when the wounded come back from Europe, I understand, some of them want to be lawyers, some doctors, some teachers, and some preachers, and I take it that that vocational board will have difficulty in giving the latitude that these men are entitled to have. Their whole function is to train them in specific, narrow lines, and I fear it on that point.

Mr. FESS. I would ask my friend to hold the question in mind until I reach the discussion of the bill, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ASWELL. All right.

Mr. FESS. I will ask the members of the committee to look into the bill and let us get what it proposes to do from the standpoint of the wounded soldier, wherever he may be found.

The bill provides in section 2 that every person who has been disabled to the degree that, when he is discharged, he becomes a beneficiary under section 3 of the war-risk insurance measure, and has been so disabled that he can not resume his former occupation or can not enter upon some new occupation, or can not fulfill any gainful occupation, or, having resumed or entered upon some other occupation, can not carry it on successfully—that man is subject to rehabilitation and is to be a beneficiary of the provisions of this act.

Now, you will notice right in the beginning that it does not take in a person who does not fall under the requirements of the war-risk insurance act of October 6, 1917.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I am trying to follow the gentleman. The act the gentleman refers, as I have it here, is dated September 2, 1914.

Mr. FESS. This is the act of September 2, 1914, as amended October 6, 1917.

Mr. BURNETT. It was amended then?

Mr. FESS. Yes. It is the amended war-insurance measure. The definitions or limitations of section 2 are that anyone so disabled that he can not resume his work, or having resumed it, can not carry it on successfully, shall be a beneficiary of this legislation. Section 3, following it, is a little beyond that. A man may have been so disabled that he becomes a beneficiary of the war-risk insurance act under article 3 for compensation, and yet he may resume his former work or he may enter upon some other work successfully. While section 2 applies to those who can not successfully carry on their gainful occupations, section 3 applies to those who can do so.

Now, while he is doing his former work or is entering upon some new work and doing it successfully, he may see an opportunity under training where he might do a great deal better than he has been doing. He becomes a beneficiary under this act if he so chooses. In other words, section 2 limits it to the people who can not resume their work or carry it on successfully. Section 3 extends it to those who can resume their work or can carry it on successfully.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I read the bill and report—and the gentleman is commenting upon it—I obtained the idea that section 3 enabled any enlisted soldier, regardless of whether he was incapacitated for labor or not, to receive education at the expense of the National Government under the Federal Vocational Board.

Mr. FESS. Yes; provided that his disablement is to the extent that he becomes a beneficiary under section 3 of the war-risk insurance act, which act defines the character of disability.

Mr. STAFORD. Is section 3 limited in its scope by the articles of the war-risk insurance law?

Mr. FESS. No one is the subject of rehabilitation under this bill who does not fall under the article for compensation, article 3 of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I understand if they are of that class, the National Government intends to establish a national university to extend to them the benefits of it?

Mr. FESS. You do not have a national university for the purpose of this bill. It is a trade school. The university man—and my friend is a university man—knows that that is not university work at all.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. All these soldiers that are returned will not be farm hands and factory hands. A large number of these young men will come back and wish to continue their courses in the university, so that the gentleman's point is well taken. This movement should cover the whole scope of education and not merely the education of factory hands.

Mr. FESS. This bill in the main limits it to vocational training. It does not go to university training for a profession.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The question of the gentleman from Louisiana prompted my question, and that is going to the very bottom of this bill or the purpose of it. My understanding is that this bill is not to take care of the men simply because of the fact that they may have been wounded or injured in the service, but it is to take care of those who have been so disabled that they will need this rehabilitation, and this is, in addition to that, to give him this vocational training.

Mr. FESS. My friend is mistaken about that, if I understand his inquiry.

Mr. McKENZIE. Permit me a word further. For instance, a young man goes into the Army; he receives a wound; he is discharged from the Army. Prior to going into the Army he was a law student. After coming out he desires to continue his law studies. This bill does not mean that the Government is going to send that young man to law school and educate him as a lawyer, when, as a matter of fact, he can be a lawyer just as well, regardless of the wound he received. Am I right?

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is right. I did not catch the full meaning of his first observation.

Mr. ASWELL. Suppose this young man had one year in the law school. What are you going to do with him?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not taking the position that you should not do anything for him. The purpose of this bill is not to take care of a man under those circumstances. It would be foreign to the purposes of this bill.

Mr. FESS. The bill clearly defines it in lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, on page 2, "unable to carry on a gainful occupation or to resume his former occupation."

Mr. ASWELL. Is not law a gainful occupation?

Mr. FESS. It is a question whether it is that or a profession. If it is an occupation, it is included.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the principle object of the bill to enable people to be self-supporting instead of imposing the burden of their support on the Government for the rest of their lives? Is not that the object of the bill?

Mr. FESS. Yes; distinctively so.

Mr. ASWELL. What is it proposed to do with a young man who had one year in a law school?

Mr. FESS. If he had no occupation before he went to the law school. The language which was not in the bill when it was originally written, but was put in the bill by the House committee with that idea in view is, "unable to carry on a gainful occupation" was written to include such person. You could not say "resume his old or enter upon a new," because neither would be applicable to one who had no occupation before he enlisted, consequently we wrote that "unable to pursue a gainful occupation" in order to include him, but not to give him a finishing course in law, as I understand the bill.

Mr. ASWELL. I will say to my friend from Ohio that if this bill does not permit the young man who was beginning his law course to continue it, then it should be amended so that he might.

Mr. FESS. If your profession is a gainful occupation instead of a profession, it is in here; but I state to my friend clearly that that was not my view. I was limiting this to vocation instead of profession. While I admit the strength of my friend's position, the bill does not, in my judgment, look to professional training which will require a long period of time.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like my friend to define "vocation."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is important, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] has said, that the gentleman from Ohio define precisely what the word "vocation" is intended to cover. My understanding has been that the training proposed was vocational, mainly industrial, not professional; but from some suggestions that have been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] I assume that he has in mind professional training. That was evidently not the original purpose of the bill, and I think it is pretty well to have that clearly defined and understood.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the vocational bill signed by the President on February 23, 1917, and which should be a guide in the use of the word about which this dispute has arisen, provides for agricultural education and industrial education. Vocational training comprehends both of them. We did not include in that bill, known as the Smith-Hughes bill—and I might say I was on the commission which recommended the bill to the Congress for action—training for any profession, but for a vocation; and this rehabilitation bill has been written on that basis, using the term "vocational training," and also limiting it to gainful occupations. We also provide that the board created under that law is to administer this proposed law.

Mr. MONDELL. So that there was no purpose in the minds of those who drafted the proposed legislation providing for professional education and training of any sort?

Mr. FESS. No. At least it was not so stated. However, the bill in lines 7, 8, and 9, on page 2, under the wording "such course of vocational rehabilitation as the board shall prescribe and provide" may give such power. But I do not think it is so intended.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have in mind two cases, I do not know that they would be reached by this proposition, but I want to suggest them to my friend—two cases of persons in my own city who were drafted and taken into the service. After being in the service a few months they were discharged with this statement: "Discharged because of tuberculous tendency not incurred in the service." What is to be the status of persons like that? How are you going to rehabilitate persons whose discharge states that they were discharged for disability not incurred in the service? And yet they were admitted as being sound persons, fit to enter the Army, and had been in the Army several months; but they were handicapped by that statement in their discharge. What is going to become of them?

Mr. FESS. If the disability was not incurred in the service, the man would not be a beneficiary of article 3 in the war-risk insurance bill, and he would not come in here, as that law is the basis of this in determining who are included as subject to the benefits herein provided.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; but both of these men were insured. What is their insurable status? They were insured when they entered the service.

Mr. FESS. They would still be insured. That is a different section of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; provided they keep up their payments after they come out.

Mr. FESS. Certainly. Section 3 is the definitive section for the interpretation of this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. But they came out unable to work. When they seek employment they are not able to work. Yet they claim that, although they were admitted as sound persons, they were discharged because of tubercular tendencies after being in the service for several months; and, with families on their hands, they are given this handicap by the discharging authorities.

Mr. FESS. Let me say to my friend from Massachusetts that his people do not come under this bill if they are not under the third section of the war-risk insurance bill, because this bill is built upon that basis.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. They are under the war-risk insurance bill, but they are discharged.

Mr. FESS. You might say that they ought to be in the bill, but there are a good many things that probably are good that you can not put in this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I said, "When I go back to Washington I will ask Prof. FESS, who has these ideas on vocational care, and preparing to take care of these unfortunate people." I want to see where they are coming in. I understand they have no standing at all.

Mr. FESS. Not unless they are beneficiaries under the war-risk insurance bill.

Mr. TEMPLE. Under article 3 of that bill.

Mr. FESS. Under article 3 of that bill. This bill is clear and specific on that point. The wording of section 2, page 1, "that every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under article 3 of the act entitled," and so forth, limits the operation of this bill to beneficiaries of article 3 of the war-risk insurance act. Section 3 of this act repeats the language, and these two sections include the persons affected by this bill.

Mr. IGOE. I should like to ask the gentleman about another phase of this, if it will not disturb him.

Mr. FESS. It will not disturb me.

Mr. IGOE. I should like to ask as to the effect of this bill on the allotment feature. Also, I am confused by a part of section 3 which provides that under some circumstances, if the wounded soldier fails to take this course, his compensation may be cut off. I should like an explanation of that.

Mr. FESS. If my friend will permit me, I will answer that. I should like to have the very careful attention of Members to the pay, the compensation, the allotment, and the allowance features of section 2, lines 14 and 15, on page 2:

> Shall, while following the same, receive monthly compensation equal to the amount of his monthly pay for the last month of his active service, or equal to the amount to which he would be entitled under article 3 of said act, whichever amount is the greater.

That is explained in this way: Under article 3 of the war-risk insurance bill he is paid a compensation to begin immediately after discharge. That compensation is determined first by the character of disability.

If it is a total disability it is so much, dependent upon the situation of his family, the number of his dependents, such as wife, child or children, widowed mother, and so on, and if he has lost both arms or both legs or both eyes it is $100 a month. The compensation is less if disability is only partial, but it will still be rated on the number of dependents. If he has a wife or a child, or both, or more than one child, it varies, as gentlemen will remember.

Mr. MADDEN. It may go up to $75 a month?

Mr. FESS. Yes. In case he has a wife and three or more children it is $75. Now, in order that we might give this disabled soldier the better chance, we did not specify that he should receive the compensation under article 3 unless that was greater than his monthly pay when he was discharged, and, as you will note, he has a virtual option. However, he would certainly choose the salary if that is higher than the compensation, and vice versa. He may take under his salary or he may take under article 3. If article 3 gives him more, he takes that. Take the case of a captain with a wife and no children. A captain's salary is $200 a month, but his compensation under article 3, if he had neither wife nor child, would be only $30 a month. If he had wife and no child it would be $45. Consequently he will take at once under salary instead of under compensation. Take a captain with a wife and three children, under compensation he would get $75 under the war-risk insurance, but his salary being $200 he will take under his salary. On the other hand, if you take a sergeant—his salary is $38 a month. If you take a sergeant with a wife and no child his compensation would be $45, and if he has three children it would be $75; so he would not in either case take under salary, but he would take under compensation. If he is an enlisted man, not an officer, he will always take under compensation and never under salary, because the salary is lower.

Mr. IGOE. Was it the intention of the committee in line 21, where you speak of compulsory allotments——

Mr. FESS. I have not reached that yet. Now, as to allotments——

Mr. MADDEN. Before going to the allotment proposition I would like to ask a question. We have just been talking about vocational training and we have been wondering what it embraced; whether it was purely mechanical or whether it was partly mechanical and partly educational in other directions—scholastic education. I took the trouble to look up the definition of "vocation." Here it is:

> Any occupation or pursuit for which one qualifies oneself, or to which one devotes one's time or life; a calling; a career; fitness for such a career.

So I suppose a vocational education will embrace not only a literary training, if that was the thing the wounded soldier saw proper to follow, but mechanical training as well.

Mr. FESS. I confess that that was not my conception; but if that is the true limitation of the words, the young man who studied law would fall under it. And, as I said before, the latitude given the board under this bill will most probably allow it if it appears proper.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman was speaking about the officers and the salary or compensation being so much. Is it for him to elect which he will take?

Mr. FESS. He takes whichever is larger.

Mr. HEFLIN. Whichever one he decides to take, he can take?

Mr. FESS. He certainly would decide the larger, but I suppose he could take the smaller. The language is alternative.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. It seems to me that this is very important. If this bill is to be applicable to the vocational-education bill now in force, that eliminates the assistance that the crippled soldier might receive in the profession of teaching. A large number when they come out will be equipped to teach.

Mr. FESS. I admit the strength of the gentleman's statement, and can only repeat that the language of lines 7, 8, and 9, on page 2, is doubtless broad enough to cover teaching.

Mr. ASWELL. What I would like to have clear and definite is, Shall this bill be limited to industries and agriculture—that is, the factory, and so forth—or shall it include vocations along the line of teaching, medicine, and law, that young men would like to follow?

Mr. FESS. I can only repeat what I said, that if the term "gainful occupation" will include the professions, I have no doubt that it is in, and if it does not include it, it is not. In that case it must come under the powers of the board over courses.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would like to add that it includes the kind of training spoken of, and if a man has been so disabled that he can not follow that occupation without being rehabilitated, and if he has been so injured under the terms of article 3—there are several limitations in the bill besides the limitation of vocational, which only governs a small section of the general field.

Mr. FESS. I thank my friend from Pennsylvania for his observation. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to attend to the question of my friend from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], the allotment and allowance, and this is probably the most delicate feature of the bill and the most difficult to understand.

> If such person was an enlisted man at the time of his discharge, for the period during which he is so afforded a course of rehabilitation, his family shall receive compulsory allotment and family allowance according to the terms of Article II of said act in the same manner as if he were an enlisted man, and for the purpose of computing and paying compulsory allotment and family allowance his compensation shall be treated as his monthly pay.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield right there? I want to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand it, compulsory allotment applies only to the wife and children.

Mr. FESS. That is right. The other beneficiaries are included when the soldier elects to do so.

Mr. IGOE. It does not include parents of a disabled soldier. You do not intend to include them?

Mr. FESS. No; we are not changing the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman must understand that as to parents and dependent brothers and sisters it is voluntary, and unless you write it into the bill would you not deprive that soldier's dependents of the allowances from the Government?

Mr. FESS. It will for this reason: The allowance by the Government stops one month after his discharge. That is the law, and unless you write the allowance and allotment into this bill, as we do in section 2 but not in section 3, they will not get it. We have limited it even in section 2 to the class of compulsory allotments.

Mr. IGOE. That is what I wanted to find out, whether the committee had intentionally confined it to the compulsory allotments.

Mr. FESS. That was the intention. In other words, without this provision there is no such thing as a family allowance or allotment to a discharged soldier, for when he is discharged that allowance is stopped, and in order that his family may be cared for while he is gone off to be trained we have written it that in cases which are under compulsory allotments shall continue during the time of his training.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. How long would the vocational training take? Is that subject to the decision of the board?

Mr. FESS. Yes. It has been variously estimated. Eight to twelve months are frequently required. But no limit can be placed in the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. So it may continue indefinitely.

Mr. FESS. It might; there is no limit save the good sense of the board in charge.

Mr. HASTINGS. During that time the allotment is going to the dependents of the soldier.

Mr. FESS. Yes. Compulsory allotment to the class of persons included in section 2, but not in section 3. Some Members wished to extend it to those classes in section 3, but the bill as written and passed the Senate excludes it from beneficiaries in section 3.

Mr. HASTINGS. Whether it be one year or five years.

Mr. FESS. He has to make his own allotment, and the Government makes an allowance to match it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, the experiences in other countries show that the average period of training does not exceed six months. If at the expiration of that time the man is not found capable of being rehabilitated, he is let go.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Who decides as to what kind of training a man shall receive, the disabled soldier or the board?

Mr. FESS. It will be an agreement between the board, the Surgeon General's office, and the soldier to be trained.

Mr. DENISON. I can imagine a disabled soldier having been used to some occupation in which he is compelled to read. Would, under the terms of the bill, such a man be entitled to be educated if he should lose his sight—would he be educated to read by instruction given to the blind?

Mr. FESS. I think so. There is nothing in here to prevent it, and that is the very purpose of the legislation. We are told in many cases men who have returned maimed have been so trained that they became more skillful after training, although disabled soldiers, than they had been before they enlisted. The evidence along this line is wonderfully reassuring to those whose anxiety for these injured citizens is acute. To revert to the question of the gentleman from Illinois as to the treatment of the blind; that is, if a man lost his eyesight, under the compensation of article 3 he would get $100 a month, anyway. He can go on and be trained so that he might later on have an additional compensation. Suppose he does work under this training for which he can get $100 a month. He will get not only the $100 a month from the Government under the war-risk act, but will get in addition whatever he earns after he has been trained. That is specifically provided for in the bill. In other words, he will be supplied with an incentive to take the training.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that before this becomes a law the extent and meaning of the word "vocational" ought to be very well settled. The rule of construction is where there are doubtful words or phrases used that the debates are looked to for the purpose of getting the meaning intended by those making the law. It seems that the lexicographer lays down one definition which is absolutely at variance with the understanding of the gentleman. A great deal of confusion might arise hereafter when these young men apply for this vocational education because of construction. Therefore I would like to suggest to the gentleman that before this bill is finally enacted into law that matter ought to be amended so as to meet the views of the gentleman, if that is the intention of his committee and of this committee, or so broadened as to meet the definition laid down by the lexicographer.

Mr. FESS. I would state to my friend that I thank him for the suggestion on the rule of legal construction.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to the ranking member on the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me make a suggestion, that while the word "vocation" applies unquestionably to anything that a man follows for the purpose of making his living, that the phrase "vocational education" has a well-understood and well-defined meaning. It does not include general education; it does not include professional education; it would not include the idea of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL]. Vocational education is something that is limited to either those things that are manual in their nature or that are business in their nature. Strictly speaking, I think I am justified in saying that those are the only two branches of what is known as vocational education, so that if gentlemen have the idea that this would allow the Government to pay for a general education in a college or for a professional education in a college, I think they would be mistaken, because that would not be the interpretation. If gentlemen believe that ought to be done, that is a matter for the committee of the House to decide.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa a question in connection with that. He is a lawyer and a judge, and was on the committee and had much to do with the vocational-education bill of last year, and I therefore want his opinion on this: If a young man is in the first year of his law school and has gone out under the draft or has volunteered, and is wounded so that he is unable to resume his studies—that would be the occupation—does the gentleman from Iowa think that this law intends that the Government should put him through the law school for three years to finish his course?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not.

Mr. FESS. I do not think so either. Whether that power is in the board or not, I am quite certain that is not in the minds of the framers of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think it touches that class of cases at all.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not want to be understood as intimating an opinion as to whether that ought to be done or not.

Mr. TOWNER. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. My idea is that it ought to be cleared up.

Mr. TOWNER. It was only that I desired to say to the gentleman that vocational education is a thing that is not as large in its meaning by any means as it has been interpreted and used as is the word "vocation," which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] secured the definition of.

Mr. STAFFORD. "Vocation" is used in contradistinction to "avocation."

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. When a man says that he is following his vocation, that would include his profession, but when you say that you are going to vocationally educate a man, that would not include a profession; it would not include anything except those things which are referred to, business or manual.

Mr. HUSTED. A vocational education would include a course in typewriting and stenography?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. If it would include a course in typewriting and stenography, why would it not include a general business course?

Mr. TOWNER. It would. Vocational education does include all matters of business and all matters that apply to manual occupations of any kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that under the unanimous-consent agreement there is no expiration of time, except upon the motion of the chairman of the committee. We are not limited in debate to even one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that the gentleman from Ohio had been recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the rules of the House no person can proceed for more than one hour. The gentleman having charge of the time can yield another hour to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio such time as he desires.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Iowa think it could be possible at this stage to come to an agreement in reference to the conclusion of general debate?

Mr. MADDEN. That can not be done in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be done in committee.

Mr. TOWNER. We can rise to do that, but I think we should not attempt to do it just now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no disposition to prematurely cut off debate.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me make this suggestion to the Members of the House: It would be a good deal more satisfactory to the House if these matters should be referred to while the bill is being read for amendment, because it is the immediate subject under discussion. Of course it takes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] away from his line of thought and consumes a good deal of time if everything in each particular section is referred to that is in the mind of gentlemen.

Mr. MADDEN. While we may be very foolish in the questions we ask the doctor, it gives him an opportunity to show his wisdom in his replies.

Mr. FESS. That is very embarrassing to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I will not take that time if I am permitted to proceed. However, I do not wish to be discourteous. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to ask a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I will not disturb the gentleman if he wishes to complete his statement, any more than to say this: I would like the opportunity to say I do not think the scope of vocational education as understood and enunciated by the gentleman from Ohio meets the view of a great many Members of the House who believe that wounded soldiers ought to be given a wider scope to prepare themselves for rehabilitation after they have gotten through with their work in the war.

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say, to relieve the membership of the House of a doubt that is in the mind of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], that the bill provides that in case of the vocational board defining a course to pursue, it is not defined in limitations. It says such courses as in the judgment of the board it may provide and prescribe, so that will cover that case.

Mr. ASWELL. That is the very point. I doubt the wisdom of permitting the board to determine what the man shall do. Let the man decide himself, it seems to me.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me say to the gentleman from Louisiana that is exactly what this bill does.

Mr. FESS. Now, if the membership of the committee will permit me, there was a great conflict in the minds of members of the committees of both the House and Senate as to whether this should be compulsory or whether it should be optional. I confess when I first studied the subject and when I addressed the House last October I thought it ought to be compulsory; that every disabled soldier ought to be required to take some vocational training.

After going over it pretty thoroughly I came to the conclusion that the only compulsion in it ought to be economic rather than governmental. That is written in this manner on page 3, where it provides:

> That if such person willfully fails or refuses to follow the prescribed course of vocational rehabilitation which he has elected to follow—

You see he is consulted about what it is to be and he had elected to follow this—> in a manner satisfactory to the board, the said board in its discretion may certify to that effect to the bureau, and the said bureau shall, during such period of failure or refusal—

Withhold the compensation, and so forth. It is permissive to the board, as it should be in my judgment, to certify this fact; but it is imperative on the Bureau of War Risk to withhold it when so certified, so that we have here economic control rather than either governmental or military.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Wisconsin rose first. I yield to him.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire as to how long a period of time would the withholding of the compensation continue? Suppose the soldier should absolutely be recalcitrant and would not continue his studies. Would not the compensation be withheld perpetually during that period?

Mr. FESS. If he refuses to pursue his course then the board may use its discretion to certify that fact and the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance shall withhold the compensation.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very point. Then when he once enters upon this work of vocational rehabilitation if he changes his mind without the approval of the board, then the compensation will be withdrawn for the time so long as he persists in that determination?

Mr. FESS. The board may certify that fact. It does not say so, but the board will investigate his case to ascertain the facts upon which it may give advice to the bureau touching this case under the charge of the board.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the said board shall during such period of failure or refusal withhold.

Mr. FESS. Not said "board," but said "bureau." It is discretionary with the board, but compulsory with the bureau.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then if the board in its discretion certifies that fact it will be withheld until he changes his opinion?

Mr. FESS. The withholding must be compulsory in part or all, but dependent entirely on the discretion of the board which has charge of the training of the soldier. It would be unwise in not permitting this latitude to the board.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to have it cleared up, if possible, along the line of the question I asked a while ago. I asked the gentleman from Ohio who determined the course of instructions a man would receive, and he answered it would be determined at a conference. Then afterwards the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] said it was compulsory; it was absolutely under the control of the disabled soldier; that he had the power to elect which he would take. Now, suppose a man is a mechanic or a laborer or a farmer and he should elect to have the Government educate him for a lawyer. Could such a thing as that be done under the terms of this bill? If it can be, it ought to be amended.

Mr. FESS. I do not think he would be trained for a lawyer in any case; that is a profession. Of course, while he must choose in the final decision, his choice will be assisted in the advice given him by both the board or those sent by the board in conference with the Surgeon General's office or medical force in charge of the hospital where he is being functionally rehabilitated.

Mr. DENISON. There seems to be some question.

Mr. FESS. I can only repeat that while he is in the hospital under the control of the Surgeon General's office the vocational board would have an advisory function of conferring with both the Surgeon General's office and with the patient and there in conference determine what the training shall be, but, of course, the final option is with the individual.

Mr. DENISON. He has no right under the terms of the bill to go before the board and demand that he be given a certain line of training, has he?

Mr. FESS. No; whatever he does will be elected by him; but it does not mean that the man will receive anything he wants to do; certainly not. The mere whim or ambition of a crippled soldier can not be allowed to overrule the judgment of the medical, surgical, and vocational officers.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will, to my friend from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In that same connection, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Lines 8 and 9, page 2, refer to the course of vocational rehabilitation which the board shall prescribe. On page 3, in line 3, it refers to the course which he shall elect, and it left me somewhat in confusion; or, to put it in another way——

Mr. FESS. The course that any soldier will take must be prescribed by the board, but the soldier will elect what he wants to do, and upon the advice of those in authority will decide his course.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Now, to put it in a concrete form, suppose a soldier elects that he wants to learn to be a shoemaker, to run a shoe machine. The board says he is not fitted for that, but that they will teach him to be a carpenter. Now, in the last analysis, does the man elect or does the board prescribe?

Mr. FESS. The man elects; but it is the board's ratification as to whether he be allowed to do it or not. It must be so, for this is a matter of public as well as personal concern.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In other words, the board has a veto on the election which a man might make.

Mr. FESS. The board can not force a man to do something that he does not want to do, but it can substantially veto whatever choice he may make.

Mr. MADDEN. He may want to do a lot of things, but he will have to be trained in that in which he can be trained by the vocational board.

Mr. FESS. My friend from Illinois has put it clearly.

Mr. TEMPLE. No man can go to any college and follow a course that the college does not furnish. The board will prescribe certain courses, and a man can elect from among them, but he can not elect to take one that is not provided.

Mr. FESS. Dr. TEMPLE has made a very apt reference, which puts the answer in a nutshell.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a question for information. On lines 9 to 12, inclusive, on page 3, it says—

That no vocational training shall be carried on in any hospital until the medical authorities certify that the condition of the patient is such as to justify such teaching.

Does that mean——

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman allow me to tell him what that means?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; that is what I want to find out.

Mr. FESS. The patient is in the hospital undergoing functional rehabilitation. Here the military authority is supreme. The Federal board can not send anybody in there to train him except on consent of the military authority or until the Surgeon General's office admits him, on the statement that the patient is in condition to be trained.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You say that no vocational teaching shall be carried on in the hospital at all?

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; I did not say that, but on the consent of the Surgeon General or his office.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You mean this man shall not be taught in the hospital? You say, "No vocational teaching shall be carried on in any hospital until the medical authorities certify that the condition of the patient is such as to justify such teaching."

Mr. FESS. I think, if my friend will permit——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think that ought to be changed.

Mr. FESS. I think, if my friend will permit, the matter is clear as to its intent and purpose, and may be all right, although it was an amendment put in the bill in another body from fear that the Surgeon General's authority might be interrupted in matters of his own duty. I may further say that none of the Members of the House committee desired such language inserted, as it seems purely surplusage.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I know, but the language does not express what you want expressed.

Mr. FESS. It is not in the right place in the bill. The section has to do with the pay of the soldier taking training. This language to which the gentleman from Michigan refers and which was inserted at the other end of the Capitol should follow line 25, on page 5, section 6.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. All right, then. I would suggest that that ought to be overhauled.

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the membership of the committee to permit me to proceed without further interruption, because I am taking too much time here and I do not need to be told that I am.

Will the committee permit me to call their attention to section 6, omitting sections 4 and 5, both of which are clearly stated and can have no points of opposition? Section 4 deals with powers and duties of the board and provides for investigations, and is taken from the Smith-Hughes law of 1917. Section 6 deals with the authority, the most important section of the bill if effective results are to be sought from this legislation. I would like to have the membership of the committee notice how we have adjusted this conflict between the military and civil authorities, and it will be an answer to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], who asked about it earlier in the discussion. As long as the disabled soldier is being physically rehabilitated, or functionally rehabilitated, the Surgeon General's Office has control. In other words, while the soldier is being healed, and until he is discharged, he must be wholly under the control of the military authority. But while he is in the hospital undergoing functional rehabilitation he would like to know about what he is going to follow, and he would like to consult about it. It would not do to give that field over to the Surgeon General's Office. That group of physicians and surgeons can not know either the requirements of vocational training or the possible demands of such trained persons. It is no reflection on a teacher to say he knows nothing about surgery. Neither is it a reflection upon a surgeon to assert he knows nothing about training. The Surgeon General's Office is not to look beyond, into the varied industries, and indicate what is demanded in commerce, labor, and agriculture, and what the trained man can do, but the Surgeon General's Office is primarily to heal. In other words, the Surgeon General's Office is dealing with the wounded man up to the time when he will be capable of being vocationally trained. It is not to remove the consequences of the wound, that is the function of the trainer, but to heal the wound. But while the patient is in the hospital he ought to be so treated that he might know what he can do, and he might have some preliminary or prevocational training to fit him for the larger training when he gets out.

But you can not admit into the hospital a trainer even for this prevocational training, except as he comes by consent of the Surgeon General's Office, and then while in the hospital for that purpose he must be under the Surgeon General. And whatever training for vocational life is done in the hospital while he is there being physically rehabilitated shall be by the assent or consent of the authority, which is the military authority. However, to insure a rational and continuous process of training the bill provides that there shall be a plan between the Surgeon General's Office—it does not specifically name this office, but it says "the military and naval authorities"—and the administrative vocational board by which such training might be begun in the hospital that will continue as a constant process outside of the hospital. But it must be under the Surgeon General. I make this emphatic and refer to it in extenso because much fear has been expressed that the Surgeon General may be unduly interfered with in the hospitals.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the make-up of the vocational board has the experience sufficiently varied to justify the hope that vocational training will be given along sufficiently comprehensive lines to meet all the cases? We have a manufacturer, a farmer, and a labor leader; and does not the gentleman think that the board ought to have a doctor on it, say, and have a banker on it, if you please, and have a lawyer on it as well? It ought to be made up of a greater number of men with a greater variety of experience than the present board has.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman for asking the question as to the character and characteristics of this board. The answer is this: Vocational training has had a limitation and the law provided the character of the board, and the board as it exists now is constituted as follows, namely: The Secretary of Agriculture is the chairman; with him is associated the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education. The latter is the secretary. With these, as ex officio members—the head of commerce, labor, and agriculture, which covers the vocational field, and the head of education, which covers the training feature—are associated—please note—James Monroe, a manufacturer, of Boston; Mr. Greathouse, a practical farmer of Indiana, the owner and manager of a great farm; and Mr. Holder, representative of the American Federation of Labor. And the board has employed as——

Mr. ASWELL. The genius of the board is Mr. Prosser. Who is he?

Mr. FESS. The board has employed as director Mr. Charles A. Prosser, formerly at the head of the Vocational Education Association, later the leading member of the President's Vocational Commission, which reported the Smith-Hughes bill, and of Massachusetts, latterly of New York, still later of Minneapolis as head of the famous Dunwoody Institute—now taken over by the Government for training purposes—and now of Washington, and by all standards the best equipped man on this subject in America. I can not think of a better organization to handle this matter than this board as it is now constituted.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. Generally speaking, the injury received by a soldier will not prove a handicap to his entering into professional labor, and a doctor, or a lawyer, or a banker on the board would be of no particular benefit, would he?

Mr. FESS. I think not. It certainly would not be an improvement upon the present management as proposed in this bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Let me ask another question: Perhaps the gentleman has covered it already. I have not had the privilege of hearing all the gentleman has stated. Where does the vocational board take over the soldier—I mean absolute control—after his discharge from the Army or before?

Mr. FESS. There is an amendment in this bill which the Senate added, in lines 1 to 4, on page 6, which permits the Surgeon General's authority to follow the patient in the vocational field while under the board in matters that pertain to the medical necessities of the patient, but it would be purely advisory to the board, as the board is advisory to the surgeons in the hospital. Specifically, the military has him until discharged; then the board takes him. But each by consent of the other is allowed an advisory function.

Mr. REAVIS. One other question: Are these injured soldiers to be discharged from the Army, so that their taking this vocational training is discretionary with them?

Mr. FESS. Yes; it is optional.

Mr. REAVIS. Do you consider that a wise provision?

Mr. FESS. At first—I mean last year when we discussed the war-risk bill—I thought it would not be, but I will say to my friend from Nebraska that I think it is wise not to make it compulsory.

Mr. REAVIS. If I may make a further suggestion, I would like to say that the average soldier, after having served abroad and being wounded and discharged from the Army, will naturally want immediately to go to his home.

Mr. FESS. And will be permitted under this law to do so.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, society has some rights in this matter. A man who is so rehabilitated that he is not a derelict, and whose handicap is largely overcome, is worth a good deal more to society than he would be if he had not had this vocational training. In the interest of society and the benefit he might be to it, would it not be wise to make this vocational training compulsory?

Mr. FESS. I came to the conclusion, after starting out in the belief that it ought to be compulsory, that it would not do to make it compulsory, on the general principle that you could compel a person to go into a training school, but you could not change his nature or his taste; you could not make him study unless he was willing. He is not a schoolboy; he is a man. I have no doubt, in my judgment, that it would be a mistake to make it compulsory.

Mr. REAVIS. My great fear is that some of these soldiers are not going to be impressed with the absolute personal and general necessity of this rehabilitation.

Mr. FESS. May I state to my friend from Nebraska that the wounded soldiers who come from Europe to Canada have on the boat accompanying them persons who have been rehabilitated, employed by the Canadian and British Governments, and they have leaflets to show them, placards, and pictures which indicate what some of their wounded colleagues are already doing, and it is said that the trip over here is always a tremendous impetus for them to go into training. And yet, as a matter of governmental policy, they are always sent home for 10 days to visit their families before training is begun. This is the practice in all the countries, and especially in Canada, where great results have been achieved.

Mr. REAVIS. I think that is a most excellent thing.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me say to the gentleman from Nebraska that the compulsory system has been tried in France and England and Canada, and has been abandoned in all of them, because it compels the soldier to remain an enlisted man subject to military orders, and what is forced upon a man is not generally well received.

Another thing: Just as soon as a man has completed his hospital treatment he is entitled to his discharge, if he can not be returned for service. That has been the military rule in civilized nations for centuries, as the gentleman knows. Now, at once, upon discharge, the soldier has the option of taking or not taking this training. It is to do or not to do, just as he decides. If he does, then the compensation provided for in the act continues to him. On the average, it takes eight months for them to complete their course, and the fact that 80 per cent of all of those do voluntarily take this course and complete it is, it seems to me, a sufficient showing that the voluntary system is proving a magnificent success.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for making his observation, which is well established.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], either one, if in the investigation of this subject they did not come to the conclusion that the Federal Government has absolutely no power, after the soldier is discharged from the Military Establishment, to compel him to do anything? As an American citizen has he not got that inherent right to refuse to go into this or any other enterprise?

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman will permit me, I recognize that to be true, but my suggestion was that he be not given his discharge.

Mr. FESS. Yes. If you do not give him his discharge he is still under the law and the recipient of allotments and allowances and all the features of the war-risk insurance.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend from California.

Mr. NOLAN. In the discussion of this bill before the committee has any reference been made to any possible discrimination by employers against these men that might be rehabilitated? I have this in mind: The liability companies in insuring employees in industry specify certain physical requirements of employees, and it has come to my notice on numerous occasions that large industrial concerns, and even smaller employers of men, are compelled to have their men submit to a physical examination. If a man is found to be physically defective in any way they have felt that the risk on him was too great to warrant their insuring him. I would like to ask if the committee gave that matter any consideration in investigating this very important question? I do not know that we have the right to impose conditions, but we might, in considering the matter at this time, also consider that element that is to enter into it.

Mr. FESS. Let me state to my friend that this bill deals only with the soldier, and being a soldier he would have the benefit of the insurance feature. I do not see how we can correct anything of that sort. We can not certainly in this legislation correct what he suggests.

Mr. NOLAN. It seems to me that some attention might be given to that, and a campaign carried on so that there would not be any discrimination, and that a foundation might be laid for an appeal to the patriotism of the employers. I suppose thousands of men will be found crippled, and it may be that thousands of those men would have to be insured by the Government—men who are to get the benefits of the war insurance act.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that that matter was taken up and thoroughly discussed and considered in Canada. It is, as the gentleman says, a question connected with the conditions that exist. In Canada an arrangement was made without any difficulty with the industrial insurance companies by which they were not to make any discrimination against injured soldiers who might be placed in mechanical and industrial pursuits as a result of their training received under the terms of this kind of a law. When this law is passed in this country I doubt not that a similar arrangement will be made. At least I hope that these insurance companies in the United States will exhibit as much patriotism as has been exhibited by the like companies in Canada.

Mr. NOLAN. If I am not imposing upon my friend from Ohio——

Mr. FESS. I will yield further.

Mr. NOLAN. We have here an opportunity of circumventing that, in case the employers or the indemnity companies should try to do it, by amending the war-risk insurance act so that employers would be protected as fully in the case of these rehabilitated men as in the case of other employees. I am very glad the committee had the experience of Canada on that particular phase of it, because when we go back into industry after this war, and when there is great competition, as there always is in industry, requiring the employment of men who can produce the greatest results, I am afraid we will have to take this phase of it and give a lot of consideration to it if the employers and insurance companies do not exhibit a patriotic spirit.

Mr. FESS. This proposed bill does not attempt to modify the war-risk insurance act in any manner, except to repeal section 304 of the amendment of October 6, 1917.

Mr. HICKS. Will my friend from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Perhaps this will throw some light upon the inquiry of my friend from California. When we were on the other side, in conversation with the superintendent of one of the largest training schools for disabled soldiers, this phase of the question came up: That these men who were trained as carpenters and blacksmiths, and so forth, at Government expense would go out and compete with men who were not discharged soldiers. The fear in this superintendent's mind, from complaints he had received, was that there should be some compensation or some adjustment made in some way, otherwise there might be trouble between the union men who were not soldiers and the veterans, because the wounded soldiers, in addition to what they earned, would also be getting pensions, and therefore were getting a larger wage than the men working beside them who were not receiving pensions.

Mr. REAVIS. And the wounded soldiers are entitled to it.

Mr. HICKS. At the present time the patriotism of the union-labor men leads them to work on an equality with these veterans, and I believe our labor men will be equally patriotic and will welcome at the bench beside them the men who followed the flag to victory, and personally I believe the wounded soldier is entitled to all his patriotism entitles him and all his skill can yield him.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from New York that one of the points of most intense interest in the discussion was the placement of the wounded soldier after he has been rehabilitated. That is left with the board of control, which is the vocational board, upon which there are representatives of industry, agriculture, and labor, and it ought to be cared for. It is so articulated with industry and the employment of labor that it seems to me to be peculiarly fitted to conduct studies into the needs of industries and their relations to the supply of labor, which must become in an increasing fashion a very important feature, when through the war the ranks of labor, especially unskilled, will be greatly congested.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I was going to raise a point somewhat similar to that covered by my colleague, in regard to men who have been wounded and who are able to do some work, but may not be able to do the full amount of work. The ordinary labor union requires that every man shall receive equal pay regardless of his capacity for work. Suppose a man was rehabilitated sufficiently to earn a small wage at a certain trade. How can he be taken into a union in that trade, and how can be get employment, if his employers are compelled to give him the full pay of an entirely competent man?

Mr. FESS. I feel sure that will be cared for, because, so far as I know, the labor unions are back of this bill to a man.

Mr. PLATT. I know, but very often the attitude of the men is that when a man is partially disabled you can not keep him employed at a smaller wage, but that you must pay him full wages or not employ him at all.

Mr. SUMNERS. I have been talking with a number of my colleagues about the bill, and we are all for it, but there is one point with regard to which I think we are not certain. That is the point of the voluntary or compulsory acceptance of the benefits of the bill. It has been stated that in the experience of the countries having to do with the rehabilitation of their soldiers perhaps 80 per cent voluntarily accept the benefits of this sort of an education. Has the distinguished gentleman from Ohio any idea as to how we could undertake to salvage the other 20 per cent?

Mr. FESS. I confess that I have no conception of it. I asked Mr. Kider, secretary of the Invalid Soldiers' Commission of Canada, who was sent down here at the request of the British ambassador to appear and give information before our joint committee, what he would do with persons who would not follow the instruction and take up the training, and his answer was, "We would say good-by to them."

Mr. MERRITT. You can not do that.

Mr. SUMNERS. I have talked with a number of men who were themselves crippled and who have learned to use mechanical arms, and who, because they have acquired skill in that direction, have attracted the attention of other cripples. It is the unanimous opinion of these men that if you let a cripple get back into ordinary life and become accustomed to having other people sympathize with him and wait on him, and sustain toward him the general attitude that he is unable to do anything, he gets the same mental attitude, and it is impossible to get him to try to do anything.

Mr. FESS. That is the same idea that my friend from Nebraska had.

Mr. SUMNERS. I think pretty nearly everybody in the House has the same idea.

Mr. FESS. That thing was gone over, and has been studied most intensely by all those who have been working on the bill. The thing to do is to take a man out of the hospital as quickly as possible, and, while he is coming over, in fact, surround him with the conditions of other people who have succeeded. Give these men a teacher who himself has been crippled and who is a standing object lesson of what rehabilitation can do, and as far as possible keep that aspiration and inspiration in the man's mind until he gets into the school.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I did not catch the percentage of men, if the gentleman has it, that refused to take the course in England and Canada.

Mr. FESS. It is infinitesimal; it is negligible.

Mr. NOLAN. Have they in the law the same proviso that we have in section 2?

Mr. FESS. As to economic control, they have the same thing.

Mr. NOLAN. And the percentage of men that refused to accept the rehabilitation work?

Mr. FESS. Is negligible; they state it is not sufficient to mention. Now, Members of the House, there is one more statement I wish to make. This is a bill that has not been hastily framed.

The matter was called up in the discussion of the war-risk insurance act last October. I was notified at that time that the Surgeon General's office was interested in it, and various departments here, including members of the Cabinet, were at work on it. The Surgeon General, through a suggestion, or rather the Secretary of War, through a suggestion of the President, called a conference which was made up of more than 50 people. They were representatives of all classes of activities in the country. That conference finally decided upon the appointment of a committee of 16, and those 16 represented the responsible agencies of the Government. They recommended that there be a commission sent to Canada to study the situation and come back and report. The British ambassador suggested that the Canadian commission send its secretary down here to give first-hand instruction as he saw it, being with them every day. We held, on April 30, May 1, and May 2, three days' hearing before joint committees of the Senate and House.

Before these hearings came Mr. Kider, the official from Canada, the representatives of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the representatives of the American manufacturing associations, the representatives of the American Federation of Labor, the representatives of the United States Tuberculosis Association, and representatives also of the Vocational Educational Board. I should have mentioned in the beginning that Gen. Gorgas and Col. Frank Billings were present, and every department that could be interested, as I saw it, was before us, and let me say there was not one single negative note against the movement.

A bill was framed and brought in, taken up by the two bodies, and our House committee went over it as carefully as any bill that I have ever seen gone over. It was rewritten and resectioned and then reintroduced in both Senate and House.

When the Senate took it up, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has said, they discussed it for three days, and only one note of opposition to one phase, not to the bill, but to one phase of it. It came to a vote on May 25, and did not have a single opposing vote. It was a unanimous vote. The House immediately thought it was wise to take the Senate bill with a few modifications and substitute it for the House bill. I confess that there are one or two items in the Senate bill that we were not entirely satisfied with.

Our wounded soldiers are here; they are being cared for without any authority. There is not a line of authority in the law to proceed to the rehabilitation of the soldiers. And yet they are going on to do it in the belief that Congress will not refuse to ratify what they have done. For that reason I am very hopeful that we will take the bill up with speedy action and make it a law. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. If I have the time.

Mr. ASWELL. Has the gentleman any information as to whether this board would assemble these patients in some large center or institution, or distribute them as far as possible through State institutions?

Mr. FESS. The Federal Board for Vocational Education has put in operation vocational training in every State of the 48 States of the Union through the cooperation of the State boards.

Mr. ASWELL. I am familiar with that fact.

Mr. FESS. And through that agency the Federal board proposes to utilize the existing agencies instead of building new ones. By this management the Government will at once be able to command facilities unequaled. By the passage of this bill our country will be able to do at once what other countries took three years to learn.

Mr. ASWELL. That is important, and I am glad to know it.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I would like to be permitted to correct a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] which gave the impression that the labor unions insist on equal compensation for all workers, irrespective of their capacity. That is the statement that will go into the RECORD. I do not want that statement to go unchallenged.

Mr. PLATT. That is correct.

Mr. LONDON. It is not correct; the unions have never been so unreasonable as that; and only in certain sections of New York, where they are not familiar with the practices and principles of the union, does such a state of opinion exist.

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just one very important question, then I desist from further discussion. In some quarters it is urged that this vocational work shall be carried on by the military authority. In the first place, there is no law for the Army to do this, unless we write it in this law, which I am most averse to do.

Aside from the legal questions involved, including the total lack of authorization by law for such a program by the Surgeon General's office, the question arises as to whether or not the Army could successfully discharge the task. The following points are made in opposition to this proposal:

(1) Not one of the principal belligerent nations has attempted it. This includes Germany, France, England, Canada, and Italy. Even in France and Italy, where military control is continued over the period of vocational training and where this control has been acknowledged to be unsatisfactory, vocational training is given by civilians. Belgium alone, which is an expatriated country, has a scheme equivalent to that proposed by the Surgeon General's office. This is only because all Belgian citizens are under the military control of a foreign country.

(2) The occupations for which men should be trained are so many in number that the plan would be impossible, as far as hospitals are concerned. The list of occupations attached, for which Canada, Great Britain, and France are giving vocational training, numbers more than 500. The list would be larger in the United States because of our greater size, our complex and highly diversified economic, agricultural, industrial, commercial, general, and engineering occupations. Such a program could not be carried out by hospitals without the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars at a time when equipment is not to be had without commandeering. The training facilities of the country must be utilized. This means dealing with the schools and colleges—public and private, agricultural, industrial, commercial, normal, engineering, and universities. It involves the establishment of schemes on farms, in offices, and in manufacturing plants. It involves placement of men and the follow up of men to prevent them from being exploited.

Is Congress ready to make this extension of military duty and power over civilian life?

(3) Those who look forward to a national scheme of partial support and standardizing of the vocational reeducation of the victims of industry must realize that every consideration requires that the vocational reeducation of the victims of war should be in the hands of a civilian agency. Otherwise, should the second step come, the training of disabled civilians would be given under military control. If a new board were established for the purpose, the Army facilities could not be adapted to the purpose and the Army experience in dealing with the victims of war would have little, if any, carry over for the benefit of a plan for the victims of industry.

(4) It is the business of the Surgeon General's office to give physical reconstruction to disabled soldiers. Construction begins, and hence their manual activities are for therapeutic value only, excepting as they incidentally help a man along toward the more serious and thoroughgoing work of vocational training to be given after his discharge.

It will be illuminating to enumerate a list of occupations employed in the belligerent countries. I am satisfied that our varied and complicated industrial life would run his list in this country close to the 400 mark:

LIST OF OCCUPATIONS BEING TRAINED FOR IN CANADA.

1. Armature winding.
2. Agriculture.

LIST OF OCCUPATIONS BEING TRAINED FOR IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Agricultural motor tractor work.
Aircraft manufacture:
- Fusilage making and erection of engine on fusilage.
- Main planes, tail planes, elevators, and ailerons:
  - Rib assembling in jigs.
  - Rib finishing (sandpapering, etc.).
  - Assisting on plane assembling, e. g., threading on ribs, etc.
  - Wiring up planes and riveting bolt ends.
  - Assembling elevators and ailerons in jigs
  - Varnishing (unpainted woodwork).
  - Doping.
  - Sandpapering.
  - Attaching external fittings to planes, etc.
- Fusilages:
  - Assisting assembling of sides in jigs.
  - Cleaning up assembled sides.
  - Attaching fittings to fusilage sides
  - Wiring up and riveting bolts.
  - Varnishing.
  - Assisting in final assembling of fusilage (craftsmen's mate).
  - Assembling and making small repetition parts, e. g., camera boxes, brackets, seat boxes.
  - Assembling under carriages.
- Erecting shop:
  - Mechanical assemblers (e. g., struts in planes, etc.).
  - Wiring of machines.
  - Splicing.
  - Bolting and screwing assembled fittings and instruments to machines.
  - Bolting fittings on planes.
  - Riveting bolts.
  - Offering up and bolting tail units in place.
  - Offering up and pinning elevators and ailerons to planes.
  - Attaching wiring skids to main planes.
  - Assembling and attaching shock absorbers.

Boot and shoe manufacture:
- Power eyeletting.
- Rollers.
- Sole molder.
- Power skiving.
- Pounding machine.
- Leveller.
- Loose billing.
- Universal sluggers.
- Sole layers.
- Bottom scourer.
- Grading machine.
- Splitting machine.
- Pattern grading.
- Outsole and insole channeling machines.
- Loose nailers.
- Stitching machines.
- Heel-attaching machines.
- Heel trimmers.
- Heel scourers.
- Heel-burnishing machines.
- Clicking presses.
- Cutting presses (rough stuff).
- Pull-over machine.
- Consol laster.
- Blake sewer.
- Standard screwer.
- Welt sewer.

Boot and shoe manufacturers—Continued.
- Rough rounders.
- Edge trimmers.
- Edge setters.

Dental mechanics:
- Plaster of Paris work.
- Impression trays.
- Articulators.
- Founding casts.
- Vulcanite work.
- Porcelain teeth.
- Plate work.
- Pressure casting.
- Springs and swivels.

Electricity substation attendant:
- Workshop.

Employment in picture theaters:
- Operators and operators' assistants.
- Doorkeeper.
- Attendant.

Engineering:
- I. Minor machine operations—
  - Capstan lathes.
  - Light drilling.
  - Grinding.
  - Milling.
  - Light planing.
  - Shaping.
  - Slotting
  - Screwing.
  - Sawing.
  - Boring.
  - Power presses.
- II. Skilled trades—
  - Coppersmithing.
  - Fitting, turning, and brass finishing.
  - Molding.
  - Pattern making.

Furniture trade:
- Drawing and designing (only for men specially gifted).
- Carving and inlay.
- Upholstery.
- French polishing.
- Cabinetmaking.
- Chair making.
- Machine work.
- Wood turning.
- Lining or marking out of timber.
- Sandpapering by hand.
- Glass beveling, machine process.
- Surface polishing of mirrors.
- Cleaning, coppering, varnishing, and silvering of mirrors (but not silver mixing).

Gold, silver, jewelery, and watch and clock jobbing:
- Makers up of the cheaper kinds of gold jewelry.
- Makers up of all imitation jewelry.
- Makers up of cigarette cases, match boxes, and the less skilled forms of silverware and simple forms of electroplate goods.
- Hand wire drawers in the jewelery, silversmiths, and electroplate trades.
- Polishers and finishers.
- Stampers and piercers.
- Enamelers.
- Helpers in gilding and plating shops.
- Melters and those attending to sweeps and residues.
- Jewelers, silversmiths, and electroplate workers in all the more skilled branches of the trades.
- Setting in the jewelry trade.
- Britannia metal smithing.
- Silver hand polishing.
- Die sinking.
- Spinning and turning.
- Engraving.
- Chasing.
- Casting.

Hand-sewn boot and shoe making and boot and shoe repairing:
- Hand-sewn boot and shoe making.
- Hand repairing.
- Machine repairing—
  - Bench work.
  - Machine stitching and sewing (repairing only).
  - Finishing.
- Clogging.

Leather-goods trade:
- Fancy-leather goods.
- Solid-leather goods (other than trunks and portmanteau).
- Trunk making.

Printing and kindred trades:
- Composition—
  - Hand.
  - Mechanical—
    - Linotype.
    - Monotype.
  - Copyholder.
- Machine—
  - Platens.
  - Layers on.
  - Printing.
- Lithography.
- Photoengraving—
  - Operator.
  - Etcher.
- Bookbinding—
  - Forwarding.
  - Finishing.
- Stereotyping and electrotyping.
- Warehouse.

Tailoring:
- Cutting.
- Making up—
  - Coat making.
  - Trousers making.
  - Vest making.

LIST OF TRADES FOR WHICH INSTRUCTION HAS BEEN GIVEN IN FRANCE TO WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

MAY 24, 1918.

AGRICULTURE.

Manager, gardener, agricultural mechanic, tillers of the soil, vineyard cultivators, supervisors of cultivation, breeders, shepherds, forest guards, workers in cheese factory, milkmen, woodcutters.

COMMERCE.

Storekeepers, copyists, delivery men, errand boys, commercial travelers, barbers, motion-picture operators, architects' assistants, mechanical draftsman, librarian, bookkeepers, case packers, postal carriers, tax collectors, grocers, cashier, invoicer, typist, stenographer, hospital attendant, coroner, salesman, hotel clerk, elevator operator, newspaper editor, head road worker, market inspector, telephone operator, bank employees, policeman, interpreter, insurance agent, baggage-master, employee in mayor's office.

CONSTRUCTION.

Building painters, masons, plumbers, painter-decorator, electrician, building inspector, glazer, roof plumber, letter painter, marble-worker.

WORKERS IN METAL.

Mechanic, inspectors, jewelers, workers in precious stones, bridle maker, metal sawyers, aeroplane makers, locksmiths, welder, borers, electricians, optician, stipplers, mechanical engineer, hydraulic pressman, blacksmith, autogenous welders, riveters, dental mechanicians, turners, sheet-iron worker, tinsmith, engraver, watchmaker, stoker, tool distributor, drop forgers, coin cutters, metal turners, gear mounters, tin coppersmith, automobile mechanician, smelters, drivers of tool machines, machinist's helpers, bronze setter, gem setter, pewter welder, metal-design cutter.

TEXTILES.

Weaver, tapestry designer, tailor, cap maker, carpet makers, cutters, umbrella maker, sock maker, upholsterer, maker of pearl flowers.

CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES.

Perfumer, gas fitter, labratory helper, soap maker, oil maker, refiner, liquid air maker, chlorates maker, powder maker, maker of chemical products, candle maker, lacquer maker, bone sorter, manufacturer of matches, manufacturer of tobacco.

PAPER MAKING.

Paper machine operator, paper maker, stamper, operator of vulcanizing machine, manufacturer of caoutchouc.

LEATHER, HIDES, AND SKINS.

Shoemaker, hide worker, fur dresser, saddle maker, harness maker, morocco tanner, leather dresser, hide worker, tanner.

TRANSPORTATION.

Automobile chauffeur, garage employees, mechanic for subway, delivery drivers, railway employees, wireless telegraphers, supervisors of omnibus service, carriage washers, conductor for motor truck, machinists in street-cleaning service, meter readers.

WOODWORKING TRADES.

Carpenters, worker in can factories, basket makers, worker in toy factory, worker in piano keys factory, wood turners, wood varnishers, orthopedic carpenter, wooden-shoe maker, worker in broom factory, weaver of matting, cabinet maker, wood varnisher, ivory sculptor, grainer, sawyer, cooper, wheelwright, piano repairer, high-class brush maker, maker of ivory articles, painter of aeroplanes, cartwright.

DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Concierge, valet, porter, watchman, cook, wardrobe keeper, general servant.

BOOK TRADE.

Printers, linotypists, compositors, proof reader for music, bookbinders, engravers, technical editors, pressmen, stereotyper, machine operator, industrial photo copyist, photographers, letter-press printer.

VICTUALING.

Waffle cook, wine-cellar man, chocolate maker, hotel waiter, pastry cook, distiller, restaurant keeper, canners, sausage maker, bone remover, biscuit maker, pork butcher, baker.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Stone sculptor, mine worker, glass blowers, shopmen, clerks, errand boys, grooms, packers, porters.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the vast resources of our own country and its wonderful diversified industries would multiply greatly the number of activities to employ our disabled. It has been roughly estimated to be between four and five hundred. It is obviously too vast to even think of the scope being left with the Surgeon General's office.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, while I am heartily in favor of the principles of this bill and think it is one that we owe to the people who will be maimed and disabled for life, who have assumed the responsibilities that this Nation has on the front, I want to talk a few minutes about a subject a little foreign to it this afternoon.

In the Washington Post of May 30, a New York correspondent on the market situation contains the following, which is very suggestive to the farmers of the United States generally:

Bankers view the proposed increases in Federal taxes with equanimity. They contend that if the new tax schedule is made equitable there will be no occasion for fear in Wall Street. President Wilson admitted in his address that the existing statute had inequalities. The question of equal taxation raises a point, whether cotton growers and cotton-goods manufacturers will have to bear special taxes. It is alleged that cotton-goods men are making as much as 300 per cent profits, and that they have escaped special taxation so far because of influence in Congress. Nothing would please Wall Street more than to see cotton taxed. It is asserted that the prejudice of the solid South will be overcome by the united influence of the rest of the country. It would also please Wall Street if the western farmer were included in the new taxation program.

The question arises as to the truthfulness of some of these statements. The cotton manufacturer is taxed on his income and his excess profits just the same as the Wall Street magnate. So is the cotton farmer and so is the western raiser of stock and grain. The statement "they have escaped special taxation so far because of influence in Congress" is not true if it means that they are not burdened with the war taxes imposed on all in the same category alike. If the Wall Street gentry desire that specific tax be levied on each pound of cotton and on each bushel of wheat and on each yard of cloth, they would put these people in a different class and tax them specially. That would be a poor return for the patriotism which they show in endeavoring to produce the things which the Government says are necessary to win the war, to wit, bread, clothes, explosives, meat, and fats.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the cotton producer in the past year has produced in refined oil, between August 1, 1917, and April 30, 1918, 1,007,887,195 pounds—and this is pure fat. They have produced cottonseed meal, directly useful in fattening cattle, 1,912,605 tons.

The statement that cotton manufacturers are making 300 per cent profit is easily believable, but their stocks are largely held in New York and New England, and the people who hold them are paying income taxes and the corporations are paying income and excess-profit taxes. The spindles that are located in the South number 14,323,000, and in the balance of the United States the spindles number 19,423,000, and they are running almost to full capacity, and, I am informed, are having a profitable business; but is there any reason for laying a different tax on them from the tax laid on other people who are making money. That they are making money at the expense of the cotton farmer whose product has been depreciated in value recently by manipulations on the New York market, which made cotton for future delivery sell for 7 cents less per pound than the actual cotton sells for, is shown by a comparison of prices.

When war was declared in 1914 cotton was bringing 13½ cents. It is now bringing 30 cents.

[Figures compiled by former Senator McLaurin, of South Carolina, an expert both in raising and marketing cotton.]

	1914.	1918.
Standard 27-inch dress gingham	$0.07½	$0.25
Standard 4-yard sheeting	.06	.28
Ten-quarter pepperrill sheeting	.20	.62½
William Anderson Ivanhoe gingham	.10½	.35
William Simpson standard prints	.06	.22½
A. C. A. bed ticking	.10½	.38½
Cotton blankets, special size and weight	.75	2.25
Child's ribbed stockings, per dozen	.85	2.25

These prices show that the statement is probably correct that they are making handsome profits and are endeavoring to increase them by the reduction in the price of cotton. The embargo on the shipment of cotton on the railroads has been followed by the calling of all loans on cotton by the banks, which necessitates the selling of the cotton at a time when it is impossible to move it to the mills, and the purchaser is uncertain when he can resell it or at what price. The mills can afford to buy and retain it in the warehouse where located until they need it, and comparative figures show that they have been waiting for this condition to arise.

On April 30, 1917, there were stored in the factory warehouses 2,033,356 bales; at the same date in 1918 there were 1,807,055 bales, there being in 1917 226,301 bales in excess of that held by the mills in 1918. On the other hand, there are stored in the warehouses, held by the producers, at the same date in 1918, 2,843,553 bales of cotton, while there were only 2,503,411 bales so stored in 1917. The mills, therefore, have 226,000 bales less and the owners have 340,000 bales more in storage; and to depress the price and also force this cotton on the market will be vastly to the advantage of the spinner, and this probably is one of the reasons for the call of loans on the cotton.

There is certainly no reason for alarm as to the value of the cotton, because the production for the year 1916 for the entire world was 18,365,000 bales, and the consumption of cotton for the same year was 20,180,000 bales. The excess of consumption over production was 1,815,000 bales. Now, the production for the year 1917 was 17,285,000 bales, and, conceding that the consumption will decrease according to the ratio of decrease up to the present, the consumption will be 20,045,000 bales, leaving a deficit of 2,760,000 bales, which is added to the deficit carried over from the year 1916. Hence, cotton is becoming more valuable, and the only reason for a desire to call the loans that are made on it must be a desire to force a sufficient amount on the market to depress the price, which can only add to the 300 per cent profit already being made by the manufacturers.

I am not, however, admitting that they are making that large profit, nor am I admitting that they should be specially taxed more than to have all excess profits very heavily taxed; but the man who is making the cotton is certainly not sharing in the tremendous benefits, and therefore should not be discriminated against by being specially taxed and by having his loans called and his cotton forced on the market at a time when everything is tending to depress the price of his product, nor should he be specially taxed because "it will be especially pleasing to Wall Street" to tax it.

Now, in respect to what it is costing to make it, the farmer who is making the cotton and who is making the wheat, who is to be specially taxed, according to the gentlemen in New York, according to their statements, is confronted with double expense. The fertilizer that he has to buy is costing him practically 100 per cent more and the labor which he has to employ, if he can obtain it, is also enormously increased in cost, and if the propaganda is to be put out now that they be specially taxed, I submit it is one which is not taking into account the patriotism that has been shown by the farmers of the country who, at the request of this great Government, have increased the food products enormously in the last year and who are this year straining every resource to increase it in the face of a price-fixing program which, as they say, has cut the profit that is in it to a very low figure, one which is certainly not profitable, and in saying that I submit that the proposition to tax the western farmer and the southern farmer especially on their products is one which, I hope, will not commend itself to the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, there are a great many things in this bill I should like to see changed, but the discussion this morning has in my judgment settled the whole proposition as to the limitations of the bill. It is clear from the discussions, from the reading of the bill, from the intent of the Senate, and from the expressions of members of the Committee on Education that it is intended to be confined distinctly to the ordinary vocational educational activities. It is clear from these discussions that it will not include the training of lawyers, doctors, or school-teachers. That is shown here by the fact that the unanimous opinion is that the vocational board is to be the governmental agency to control it. I should very much like to see a larger scope covered by this bill, but the majority in both Houses and the committee seem to believe that it should be limited to the vocational; that is, to the agricultural and the ordinary trades or mechanical arts. Even with this limitation it is my opinion that the bill should be speedily passed to-day and be put into operation at the very earliest moment. I merely wanted to make this brief statement.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Before the gentleman sits down, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. ASWELL. I will.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. My colleague states it is generally conceded that this bill will only apply to callings or trades, industrial or mechanical, and not to any profession. We had some discussion upon that awhile ago, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] produced a definition of "vocation" from a dictionary, and in the meantime I was curious to know what the courts might have held about it. The only case I could find was a Nebraska case, and I desire to state just what the court held as to the word "vocation," and it is this. It says:

A "vocation" is an employment, occupation, calling, trade, including professions as well as mechanical occupations.

Mr. ASWELL. I will state, in reply, that is undoubtedly true as far as the word "vocation" is concerned, but "vocational education" has been construed uniformly differently. The term "vocational education" by common usage has come to apply to the ordinary trades and not to the professions.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I have been unable to find any extended definition of "vocational education," but I know that among college men it is not supposed to include a profession.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, what authority does the gentleman quote? Is that from the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; a Nebraska case, 127 Northwestern Reporter.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. A State case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I want to indorse in the strongest possible way the remarks made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]. I was one of the party he was with last fall that visited the battle line, and the impression that he received from those best qualified to speak on the question of rehabilitation was the impression that I also received, and it is that these wounded men should be given this education as soon as possible after leaving the hospital. I want to refer briefly to one or two things we saw on our trip, obtained from personal observations, which may be of interest to the Members of the House.

Let me speak for a moment of some of the great hospitals in London, and especially the orthopedic hospitals, where they rebuild the human wreckage of war. It was one of the most depressing as well as one of the most encouraging sights I saw abroad. It was really marvelous to see the way in which surgeons at these institutions salvage the men who are sent there, and it means much for the economic future of the nation. Some men come in without arms, some without legs, some are blind, others are so shattered in their heads or bodies that it seems impossible to do anything to remedy their pitiful condition. I have seen men with parts of the jaw fractured, others with nose and cheeks lacerated by a piece of shell. In restoring face wounds where the bone has been cut away they take a piece of a rib of the wounded man to replace the loss, carefully fitting the new part into the cavity. Or, if this be impracticable they take the rib from a brother or sister or some other near blood relative. I saw one of these men after he had been treated for several months. They showed us a picture of him taken the day he was received at the hospital. The change was almost unbelievable—his nose, cheek, and one-half of his jaw had been blown away. When I saw him several months after the initial treatment, while there was still a frightful scar, he was able to use his jaw almost as well as you or I. He could speak, he could eat, and all without pain.

At the military hospital at Shepherd's Bush, 1,200 patients are cared for, and, in addition to medical treatment, when they are strong enough they are taught gainful trades, so that they may again become factors in the industrial life of the nation. In one of the wards I met a young fellow who had come to the hospital so terribly mangled that his case was considered hopeless. He had been buried for four hours by a shell explosion along the Somme. After months of careful treatment his broken body had been rebuilt, and he was bright and cheerful. I asked him how he felt. "Oh, I am feeling fine. Better days ahead," he said.

Those men, after they are cured of their wounds, are given some vocational training. It may be that of a painter, a decorator, a carpenter, a blacksmith, a cigar and cigarette maker, a saddler, an upholsterer, a bricklayer, or the maker of crutches and splints. We were very much interested and impressed with the fact that these wounded men, as soon as they were able to go into the workshops, would prefer to turn their skill to the benefit of their comrades in making splints and crutches used in that hospital, and they were proud of what they were doing. They felt gratified at the thought that they were self-supporting and still doing their bit. They receive a small wage while thus employed, but they also had certain privileges. For instance, if a man was in the shops and doing daily work he was allowed to go to his meals at the first table; he was given certain privileges in regard to leave of absence from the institution; but the thing that appealed to him most was the fact of the uniform. The man in the hospital who is not working in the shops is compelled to wear a blue uniform, a sign that he is an invalid, but the very moment he enters one of the shops and becomes self-supporting he is permitted to wear the khaki uniform of his regiment. So when any of these men parade the streets of London in khaki uniform it denotes the fact that they are self-supporting citizens of the community. We were entertained one day, as my friend from Colorado will remember, in the great mess hall at Shepherds Bush, when a band composed of these armless and legless men played the Star-Spangled Banner in honor of our coming from America, and I can assure the Members of this House that we returned very cordial and enthusiastic applause for that rendition. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit, I would like the gentleman to tell the House of the hospital we visited in which the men were making virtually all the wooden legs that they were using in the British Army, and making them out of American willow.

Mr. HICKS. I will do that in just a moment, and I am glad the gentleman referred to it. At Ruehampton, right in the heart of London, is a great hospital where, as my friend from Colorado says, they are manufacturing the artificial arms and legs for use in the hospitals, and these men are all former soldiers who were themselves wounded on the battle field. Col. MacLeod, in charge, told us that 30 per cent of those who entered had no preference of a trade and left the institution without having obtained any real benefit. One man in particular we noticed who had lost both legs, one at the thigh and one at the knee, and yet for several moments after we saw him we did not know that he was a cripple.

He could run, he could walk, he could turn, and all practically without a limp. At first that man was so discouraged at his condition that guards had to be placed over him to prevent him from committing suicide. Then there came to him an inspiration that he could still make himself a useful factor in society, and from the moment of that vision he began to look upon the future in a different way, and he is to-day an educator of other men. He stands in the factory inspiring the men who come there in the same pitiful condition in which he came, with the thought that they, too, can become useful factors in the economic life of the Nation. He tells them how to adjust their artificial limbs and instructs the workmen how to make the limbs in the most scientific way, but he himself has no legs.

In the factory of which I am speaking they have lathes where they manufacture all sorts of woodenware; they have lathes where they turn out iron and steel screws and parts for machines; and they teach the men to manufacture and repair automobiles, they teach them carpentry, and then they teach men along commercial lines, such as bookkeeping and typewriting, and things pertaining to office work. They also teach them agriculture. But one of the curious things the superintendent told us was that nearly all the men preferred anything except farming; that only a few went into that line. And as far as domestic science is concerned, none whatever entered that field of occupation.

Great Britain cares for her blinded sailors and soldiers at St. Dunstans Hospital, where 350 of these unfortunates are quartered. The hostel is situated on the estate of Mr. Otto Kahn, of New York, who contributes the use of his property to this splendid work. Sir Arthur Pearson, himself blind, is the financial sponsor to the institution. The men are taught useful occupations and everything is done to prevent the blinded soldiers from falling into the slough of despond, which usually engulfs a man who has suddenly lost the sense of sight. Instead of this, his fighting spirit is aroused as he learns of the full and wonderful lives of usefulness achieved by others, and he realizes that closed eyelids do not mean lack of vision. He is inspired with the motto, "What others can make of life, I can also make." Gainful trades are taught, which will enable these sightless men to take their places in the economic world. Shorthand writing, telephone operating, shoe repairing, mat and basket making, joinery, gardening, poultry raising, and massage are the occupations in which these blind veterans find their opportunities to again become factors in the industrial life of the nation. Many volunteer workers give their time and patience to this noble work. The men are taught to read and write by the Braille system, and a short address I made to some of the workers was handed me as it had been taken down by the blind typist in this code of the sightless. The days are divided into class and lecture room exercises, shopwork, and recreation. In many of the workrooms the men were singing as their nimble fingers plaited the baskets and mats, and everywhere there was an absence of that depression and helplessness which is so often associated with a life of blindness.

In the shops, although there are sighted foremen in each department, the instruction is mainly given by men who are themselves blind. The more intelligent and apt soldiers are kept to be pupil teachers, in order to encourage the newcomer by the fact that he is profiting by the knowledge of a man who was himself blinded on the battle field only a short time before.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Gladly.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman might be interested to know that the report from Canada is that there are 196 trades that these people can follow, and in our country it has been estimated that there will be at least 400.

Mr. HICKS. For the blind?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. HICKS. I am speaking now of the blind at St. Dunstans. I want to refer one moment to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has mentioned and return to the rehabilitation of the armless and legless. We were very much impressed in observing a man who had lost an arm at the shoulder and had an artificial one, which was so adjusted with contrivances and pulleys that he could use it with almost the same power and dexterity as formerly. He was able to write, ride a bicycle, use a typewriter, row a boat, dig with a spade, and even shave himself. I saw him lift, at arm's length with the artificial limb, a 50-pound sledge hammer, and what was probably more startling was to see him take his pouch of tobacco from one pocket, which he held in one hand with his pipe, and then with the contrivance on the artificial hand take a pinch of tobacco and pack it into his pipe. Many soldiers suffer from shell shock, due to the terrific bombardment to which they have been subjected. They may be physically sound and in perfect health except for dislocated nerves. Some are unable to walk; others can not use their arms or hands. For hours volunteer nurses sit beside these men, searching with electric vibrators for a nerve which yet has life. Perhaps at first the dormant nerve will respond by only an almost imperceptible quiver, but by constant treatment day after day it will be restored to its normal condition. Then another nerve is treated, until finally the man can again walk or use his hands.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will.

Mr. FESS. Dr. Amer, of the School of St. Maurice, gives one striking example, where a very skilled violinist had his right arm taken off, and by certain functional appliances and a steel arm the man now plays the violin, holding the bow in steel fingers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] has expired.

Mr. HICKS. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. HICKS. I thank the gentleman from Alabama for his courtesy. I am glad to have the gentleman from Ohio make that suggestion, because we were most impressed with the variety of occupations that these men seem to be able to fit themselves for and to perform by means of the contrivances that have been perfected for their use. The amount of ingenuity that has been put into this salvaging of human beings is one of the marvels of the war. The science of medicine and surgery under the spur of necessity has made rapid strides in the past three and a half years, and the knowledge and experience acquired will be one of the compensations for the sacrifices made. When the true history of this war is written in the perspective of future years it will tell of the movement of ships and of armies, of victories on land and sea, of heroism in the air and in the depths. It will speak also of the great human side of the conflict; the silent, unheralded, unsung devotion of the doctors and nurses in these hospitals. I want to pay my tribute to the noble deeds of the men of genius and the women of patience of Great Britain, France, and Italy. Yea; and to those of America, too, now that our boys are in the trenches, who are giving every ounce of their strength and the full measure of their skill to the task of restoring human beings, of rebuilding the bodies and the minds of men seemingly hopelessly injured, and implanting in their shattered frames hope and confidence to fight life's battles anew. [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. In speaking of artificial limbs, do the soldiers teach themselves to use these limbs and artificial hands, or are they taught by experts?

Mr. HICKS. They are taught largely by the men themselves. In St. Dunstans Hospital, for instance—the hospital for the blind—while they have men with sight in certain departments, most of the educational work is taught by men who were themselves blinded on the battle fields. It is felt that the soldiers will have more inspiration and will be more encouraged by receiving education from men who were themselves injured only a few months before.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me say, with the gentleman's permission, that that is just exactly what this bill is for, to send these teachers to accompany these men, sometimes into a factory, into a shoe manufacturing establishment, into a boiler maker's establishment, into all of these occupations, and it teaches them to adjust their conditions to the circumstances that there exist. That is what this vocational bill is intended to do.

Mr. HICKS. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa that the moral effect of having the lessons of usefulness taught by men who have themselves been benefited by this training is most important, and I feel that this bill will do much for the future of our Republic and should have the sanction of every Member of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL].

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, shortly after the declaration of war one year ago last April, through legislation passed by this body, we decreed that the selective-draft system should be used in raising our Army instead of the volunteer system.

The most convincing argument made in favor of the selective-draft system, or that at least convinced me that the method was a correct one, was that every citizen of the Republic, no matter what his station in life, his financial condition, or his occupation, owed certain duties and obligations to the Government under which he lived.

One of the sacred obligations that he owed to the Republic was to defend and protect it against all enemies in payment for the many blessings that he had enjoyed under the Stars and Stripes; that the duty to defend the country when its flag was insulted, when property was destroyed, and our people ruthlessly murdered upon the high seas did not devolve upon any one class of its citizens but there was a universal obligation to serve resting upon the shoulders of all our citizens.

And so, upon that theory and upon that broad principle of justice, the draft law was enacted. The magnitude of this great struggle I think has convinced the majority of our people of the wisdom of the draft. So while the citizens of the Republic owe this duty and obligation to it, the Nation at the same time owes a duty to its defenders, and it is because of that duty we owe our soldiers that this legislation is proposed.

The country recognized its duty, in part at least, by enacting into law the war-risk insurance bill, by the terms of which we provide for the soldier in case of his being disabled and for his dependents in case of his death; we provide for the soldier's dependent family by means of a Government allowance while he is serving his country.

But I think the Nation owes still another duty to its disabled soldiers, that of placing them as nearly as it can, when the war is over, in the same condition as when they were called to the colors; and that, in a broad sense, is the purpose of this legislation. In other words, men are being called from every walk of life—from the workshop, the farm, the factory, and from the great business institutions of the country—to fight the battles of the Republic. If any of these men are disabled while in the service of the country, we propose by this legislation to so train those men that they may take up life's work again with the same earning capacity as when they entered the service.

Under this bill instead of paying the soldier so much a month, by reason of his disability contracted in the service of his country, we propose to offer him in addition thereto the opportunity of obtaining such training as will fit him to earn a living for himself and family, in spite of his disability, so he will not be compelled to look to public charity.

It would not be the purpose under this law, and the board, of course, would not provide a course of training to a disabled soldier unless there was reasonable certainty that by so doing the soldier would be able to follow some gainful occupation.

Section 2 provides that that class of disabled soldiers who are disabled under circumstances that would entitle them after discharge from the service to compensation under article 3 of the war-risk insurance act, and who because of their disabilities are unable to follow their former occupation, or having entered upon such occupation are unable to continue the same successfully, or who are unable to follow some gainful occupation, shall be given a course in vocational training.

There is no discretion left here with the board. They are compelled under this law to give the soldier in that class vocational training if, in the opinion of the board, by so educating that soldier he will be able to carry on some gainful occupation.

The question as to whether he is unable to follow his former occupation or some gainful occupation on account of his disabilities is a question for the board charged with administering this law.

The disabled soldier is not compelled to take this course of vocational training. He may elect to take it or not. We simply offer to give him the training. If the disabled soldier in the class described in section 2 elects to take this course of training, he shall, while following the course, receive monthly compensation in a sum equal to the amount of his monthly pay for the last month of his active service or the amount to which he would be entitled under article 3 of the war-risk insurance act, whichever amount is the greater.

If such soldier was an enlisted man at the time of his discharge, during the period he is taking the course of vocational training as provided by the board his family shall receive compulsory allotment and family allowance according to the terms of article 2 of the war-risk insurance act, and for the purpose of computing compulsory allotment and family allowance his compensation shall be treated as his monthly pay.

As stated before, this legislation does not seek to compel any disabled soldier to take a course in vocational training; it only offers the soldier the opportunity.

And if a soldier elects to take such a course and then willfully fails or refuses to follow the same, the bill provides that the board may certify that fact to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, and the bureau shall during such period of failure or refusal to follow the course withhold any part or all of the monthly compensation due such soldier; but this, of course, does not in any wise affect compulsory allotment. The family allowance paid under this section will be paid from the military and naval family-allowance appropriation, provided for in section 18 of the war-risk bill, and the monthly compensation shall be paid from the military and naval compensation appropriation provided for in section 19 of the war-risk act.

The bill also provides that no compensation under section 3 of the war-risk act shall be paid during the period that a disabled soldier is being furnished by the board a course of vocational training.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Referring to the matter that the gentleman has just been speaking about, there is provision in section 3 that "no monthly compensation, family allowances, or expenses as provided by this act shall be paid on account of any such person availing himself of the courses under this section."

Mr. VESTAL. I am speaking of section 2. I will come to that particular section later on.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well.

Mr. VESTAL. It only offers the soldier the opportunity to take this course of training. Gentlemen will notice that the language of the law is that the board may certify that fact to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in case the soldier refuses to take the course of training, and then the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance shall, during the time that the disabled soldier willfully refuses to take this course, withhold any or all of his monthly compensation. But that does not affect his family allowance or compulsory allotment. That will go on to his family just the same.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not read it that way. I would like to have somebody explain it. I understand that all his compensation is stopped.

Mr. VESTAL. No. Let us see what it says. At the top of page 3, after the first proviso it says—

That if such person willfully fails or refuses to follow the prescribed course of vocational rehabilitation he has elected to follow in a manner satisfactory to the board, the said board in its discretion may certify to that effect to the bureau, and the said bureau shall, during such period of failure or refusal, withhold any part or all of the monthly compensation due such person and not subject to compulsory allotment which the said board may have determined should be withheld.

You see there is a compulsory allotment there to take care of his family. If the soldier was a sergeant and had three or four children and was getting $75 a month, the greater part of that is a compulsory allotment, to take care of his children, and only a part of it goes to the soldier himself, so that the board can withhold what goes to the soldier himself, but can not withhold what goes to his family.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that it is fair or right or just for the Government of the United States, that has already allotted a given compensation to a man for injuries sustained in the defense of the flag, to take that compensation away from him because he thinks that he does not need the rehabilitation which this board says he ought to have? That is the question.

Mr. VESTAL. We go right back to the proposition that the board does not force him to take it in the beginning.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that.

Mr. VESTAL. If he believes he ought to have that course he may take it, and if he does not he receives his compensation.

Mr. MADDEN. If the board decide that it is wise for them to report to the War-Risk Insurance Bureau that he does not want to take it, then the War-Risk Insurance Bureau is compelled under the law to deduct this compensation from the injured soldier. Is that true?

Mr. VESTAL. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman any assurance supporting his opinion that this board will not so report to the War-Risk Bureau? Why place that power in anybody's hands?

Mr. VESTAL. I would take it that this board, charged with that duty, would be of such a character as would use the very best of discretion in these matters. You have got to lodge discretion in some official. You can not throw it wide open.

Mr. MADDEN. If you put discretion in the hands of any board where human frailty is charged with the responsibility of carrying out any law, as all laws are carried out by humanity, do you not think you are taking a great many chances of taking away the compensation that that soldier has a right to receive as the result of his injuries during the war?

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. How does the disabled soldier or sailor get into the training school in the first instance? Is it to be his own initiative, or is he directed to go there?

Mr. VESTAL. It is by his own initiative. He elects to take the course.

Mr. HUSTED. I understand that he can not be compelled to take it.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. But is there no provision in the law anywhere by which somebody is authorized to direct him to go there? I can not find it.

Mr. VESTAL. This law, as I understand it, has got to be in general terms. Of course, this board will probably follow out the course that is followed in Canada, where they have somebody on the hospital ship who gets to these soldiers as quickly as he can and explains what we propose to do and also by means of posters and things of that kind brings to the attention of the soldier the fact that he will be offered this vocational training.

Mr. HUSTED. If the gentleman will permit, I realize that no disabled soldier is required to take this training; that if he decides that he does not want to take it he may lose the compensation provided. But there is a provision in the act here that if the disabled soldier refuses to take the training, then his compensation may be taken from him. But if there is nobody to direct him to take it, what about the man who never offers to enter the school? He could avoid having the training and also receive the entire compensation.

Mr. FESS. I think my friend has a misconception when he says that the compensation will be taken from him. The compensation allowance to him as a training man is taken from him, but the compensation under Article III is not taken from him. He gets the compensation under Article III of the war-risk insurance act, but he does not get it as pay for attending this training school.

Mr. HUSTED. Is there not a provision in the war-risk insurance bill that part, at least, of his disability pension may be taken from him if he does not permit himself to be vocationally trained and rehabilitated?

Mr. FESS. I think not.

Mr. HUSTED. I think there is.

Mr. FESS. In the war-risk insurance bill?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no. There is no training provided for there.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. VESTAL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to state further, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this suggestion to the injured soldier or sailor comes in the hospital, when the first aid is given. The suggestion is made to him that he may yet become an independent citizen, and that he will be placed back into vocational life and have his share in the activities of the world. This suggestion is made all down the line through the hospital, and when he comes out of the hospital he is put right into the vocational training school.

Mr. HUSTED. The point I want to make is that I do not see how anyone can refuse to take the vocational training if he is not ordered or directed by anybody to take it.

Mr. VESTAL. Now, I want to discuss section 3 for a moment. Section 3 of this bill provides for a different class of disabled soldiers. It provides that all soldiers who are disabled and who upon discharge would be entitled to compensation under article 3 of the war risk, shall be provided courses of vocational training, so far as practicable, and under such conditions as the board may prescribe, free of cost for instruction, but this class, if permitted to take the course, shall receive no monthly compensation, family allowance, or expenses.

This section has to do with that class of soldiers who are disabled and yet their disabilities are not such as to preclude them from following their former occupation or some gainful occupation.

And the section is drawn upon the theory that although this class of disabled soldiers is able to follow former occupations, or some gainful occupations, because of disabilities, the soldiers can not produce the maximum as they could when they were called from civil life to help defend the flag, and because of that fact we seek to make these courses in vocational training available for them as far as it is practicable to do so. But as to this class we believe that the monthly compensation should be withheld, also that no family allowance, expenses, and so forth, should be allowed.

I do not believe I am in accord with the committee—at least not all of them—upon the provisions of this section. While I agree with and am in favor of the first part of the first proviso, that no monthly compensation shall be allowed, for the reason that the Government is giving him a course in vocational training in lieu of this compensation, I am unable to see how the family of a disabled soldier able to follow his former occupation, who elects to follow a course in vocational training, is any better able to live than the family of a disabled soldier unable to follow his former occupation and electing to follow a course of vocational training. And when the proper time comes I propose to offer an amendment to this section of the bill striking out monthly compensation but providing for family allowances and expenses, and striking out the last proviso in the section.

The only reason I can see for not allowing family allowances to this class of soldiers is the expense, but should we stand upon that, when the soldier offered his youth, his strength, his very life itself, for the protection of our institutions?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that the soldier who refuses to take vocational training will not be deprived of the compensation allowed to him for the injury he has received, does he?

Mr. VESTAL. I did not quite get the gentleman's question.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Ohio asserts that no deduction shall be made from the compensation allowed by the Government for injuries to a soldier, even though he refuses to take the vocational training. The gentleman from Indiana asserts that such part of the compensation as may come to the soldier himself, aside from the amount that is required to be allotted to his family, shall be deducted in case he refuses.

Mr. VESTAL. That is the way I read that section.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; that is the way I read it.

Mr. VESTAL. I may be wrong in it, but that is the way I understand it.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask my friend a question.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. A soldier who elects to follow the training is not paid any compensation under article 3, because he is paid his last monthly salary or else the compensation, but not as compensation.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. FESS. Now, if he refuses to go on with his training, does my friend say that he loses the compensation under the compensation act of October 6?

Mr. VESTAL. That is the way I read section 2.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the way I read it.

Mr. VESTAL. Section 2, not section 3.

Mr. FESS. Section 2 has to do with allowances. It has nothing to do with compensation.

Mr. VESTAL. It has to do with allowances?

Mr. FESS. Yes. Section 2 has not anything to do with compensation. Section 2 is the family allowance based upon the allotment to the soldier. That stops when he is discharged. But if he goes on under section 2 for training, he will be given, in addition to his compensation, an allowance for his family, because when he is discharged his allowance is stopped.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. But this law gives him the allowance if he goes on with the school.

Mr. MADDEN. And if he does not go to school it takes away from him the allotment which is allowed to him for the injury he has received. That is the way I read it.

Mr. FESS. My friend uses the wrong word—"allotment."

Mr. MADDEN. Then, I will say injury compensation.

Mr. VESTAL. The board may "withhold any part or all of the monthly compensation due to such person and not subject to compulsory allotment which the said board may have determined should be withheld."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman such time as he may desire.

Mr. FESS. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, there is some confusion here.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; and I think that ought to be cleared up.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois to note this. Under section 2 the amount paid to the disabled soldier that goes into the school is either the last month's salary that he was receiving when he was discharged, or else the amount provided in article 3 of the compensation, whichever is the greater. Now, listen. It is not paid as compensation but paid as salary.

Mr. MADDEN. If it goes in.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and now after he goes in he refuses to go on. He loses both the allowance and his family the compensation and salary, but he certainly is permitted to continue to draw the same compensation under article 3 of the war-risk insurance bill. He does not forfeit that by going into the school.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the committee intended to make it read that way, but I do not read it that way, and can not make myself understand it that way. Here is what I understand: When the soldier goes into the vocational-training school he is allowed either amount, the monthly pay or the amount of compensation for injury; but during the period that he is receiving either one of these he does not receive the compensation that was allowed to him for his injury. Then if he refuses to go on he does not get the monthly allowance for attending school and he loses also the right to receive such part of the compensation due to his injury as might come to him personally independent of that allowed to his family as a compulsory allotment.

Mr. FESS. Let me give a concrete case. If he is a captain he gets $200 a month salary.

Mr. LONDON. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. FESS. Yes, it has. He does not take the $38 compensation but he takes the $200 salary. While he is in the school he gets the $200 from the Government, and because he is in the school and it is not compensation but is the payment for attending school. If he goes out of the school the $200 salary stops, but his compensation of $38 does not stop.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. VESTAL. In one moment. In answer to my colleague on the committee I think that is the intention of this bill; that is what I understand is the intention, but I do not believe as a member of the committee that the language of the bill so states. That is the thing I am talking about. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the effect of the language this, that the soldier is not punished for refusing to enter the training school, but he is punished for changing his mind after he has entered it? Is not that the substance? In other words, he gets the full allowance for disability under the war-risk insurance bill if he refuses to enter the school, but if he once enters the school he loses that portion——

Mr. VESTAL. That is not the intention of the bill.

Mr. LONDON. Is not that the effect of the language?

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the confusion arise from the word "compensation," which applies while he is in the school and under the war-risk insurance bill?

Mr. VESTAL. That may be; there is no question about what the committee understands this to mean—that he shall be deprived of the compensation under the provisions of this act; that is, the additional compensation allowed him for training.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the language of the bill, if the compensation, under article 3 of the war-risk insurance act, is larger than his pay as a soldier, then, that is the compensation and it is substituted for pay, and under the language of the bill he would lose that, would he not?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. Every dollar this Government spends in caring for a disabled soldier's family and in reeducating the soldier so that he may take his place in the industrial world will be repaid fiftyfold.

Section 4 of the bill deals with the powers granted the Federal board, describing their powers and duties.

Section 5, making it the duty of the board to make studies, investigations, reports, and so forth, is taken from or copied from one of the sections in the Smith-Hughes Act.

Section 6 marks the line where military control ceases and civil control, under the Federal board, begins.

So long, of course, as the soldier is not discharged he is under the complete control of the military authorities, and all treatment to bring about functional and mental restoration to disabled soldiers should be under the control of the War and Navy Departments, respectively.

But while the disabled soldier is still in the hospital, and before he is discharged, while he is convalescing, prevocational training should be employed, getting the soldier ready for the vocational training which is to immediately follow his discharge, so to avoid any conflict in authority, we provide that when the training is employed as a therapeutic measure the Federal board may, by the consent of the military authorities act with them, but only in an advisory capacity, so as to insure, as far as possible a proper process of training and preparation for instructors for such training.

We provide further that when the disabled soldier is discharged all military control ceases, and he is then under the control absolutely of the Federal board, except that the military authorities may act with the board in an advisory capacity only as to the health of the soldier, and I understand that this arrangement is perfectly agreeable with the board and the War and Navy Departments.

In my judgment, the success of the whole scheme depends upon getting the soldier back into civil life as soon as possible. Military authority ought to cease, and the soldier ought to be discharged as soon as his medical treatment has reached finality, and as I view the matter, the board having the disabled soldier's vocational education in view ought to be consulted and advised with as soon as the soldier is brought to the hospital, and military authority ought to cease entirely as soon as the medical treatment is concluded. These men only took up arms at the Nation's call; they come from peaceful, happy homes; they are not professional soldiers; they are citizens of a great Republic, and the sooner they feel they are in control of themselves the more progress they will make in their vocational work.

A word as to the board that is to carry on the vocational work outlined in this bill. The board is composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education, Mr. Claxton. The three active members of the board, Mr. Greathouse, from my own State, formerly superintendent of public instruction, and a practical farmer, and familiar with the work of the farmer, touching all the agricultural institutions of the United States; Mr. Monroe, who was a successful manufacturer of Boston, a great student of commerce, a graduate of Boston Tech; Mr. Holder, representing labor; and Dr. Prosser, the director of vocational training.

It seems to me that this Federal board, representing as it does all phases of industrial and commercial lines, and acquainted with the labor situation all over the country, is most admirably fitted to have control of and carry out the plans proposed by this legislation. A great number of the injured men to be reeducated or given vocational training will have come from the farm, and so we have the Secretary of Agriculture, in touch with this great vocation, on the board.

Many of the injured men will come from the trades, and the Secretary of Commerce fits in well. And then we have the problem of placing the men after they have been trained in some vocation, and we have the organization of the Department of Labor, through the Secretary of Labor, to assist in this work.

Then again the board is already created and in touch with this kind of work, and it would be added expense and a loss of time if we would seek to create a new commission or board separate and apart from this Federal board to administer this law.

The other allied nations have been doing work along the lines of vocational rehabilitation since this war began. Before the beginning of the war Belgium had one institution for the vocational training of men who had been injured in industrial plants. And when Belgian territory was overrun by the German Army the institute was moved to some place in France. Then the plan used by the institution in Belgium was used in rehabilitating injured soldiers. The policy was soon adopted by all our allied countries, and the results have been marvelous.

The committee heard the testimony of a great number of persons during its hearings, but the facts stated by Mr. Kidner, connected with the commission having this work in charge, from Canada, and Dr. Prosser, who has made a study of the work in Canada, were probably the most interesting.

From the testimony there elicited we learned that Canada had sent approximately 250,000 men across the ocean to fight. Forty-one thousand were returned to Canada. Not all of these were disabled, but out of the whole number returned 2,400 were disabled to such an extent that they were subjects for vocational training, or practically 1 per cent of the whole number of men that were sent across. Under their laws in Canada it is not compulsory that any of these disabled men take vocational courses, but Mr. Kidner told us that out of the 2,400 eligible to take the course only 107 courses have not been accepted, and some of these cases are only deferred cases. The percentages as we get them from Canada show that only a small per cent are so seriously disabled as to not be able to carry on their former occupations. It is the theory of the law in Canada, and it is the theory of this bill, that a man is not given this vocational training merely because he is a soldier but because he is so disabled while in the service of his country that he is unable to follow his former occupation.

Under this law every man undergoing treatment in a hospital is given the opportunity of improving his education or his previous training. If, when his medical treatment has reached finality and he is pronounced cured by the surgeon, he is able to follow his former vocation, or some gainful occupation, he is not eligible to a course in vocational training, as provided for in section 2 of the bill.

If he desires a course in vocational training and in the opinion of the board it is practicable, then he would come under the class provided for in section 3 of this law.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this country owes a duty to these men it has called to arms in its defense; an obligation rests upon us as a Nation that we can never fully repay. The least we can do is to place them as nearly as possible in the same position and condition, so far as earning capacity is concerned, as they were when they left their peaceful, happy homes at the Nation's call.

The possibilities under this bill are so great, economically and socially, that I am sure no Member of this House will hesitate to support it.

Our soldier boys comprise the very flower of American manhood, men from every walk of life, from every vocation, and every station. Some have left the farm, some the factory and the workshop, others the great business institutions of the land, their loyalty and patriotism only measured by their opportunity to serve.

They have gone forth strong in body and limb, stout of heart, to give their lives, if need be, for the honor of Old Glory, the safety of our womanhood, the protection of childhood, and the honor of manhood; to protect and safeguard all that Washington fought for, all that the immortal Lincoln died for. [Applause.] Many of them will never return, but will forever rest on the blood-soaked battle fields of sunny France.

Thousands of them will come back broken in body and spirit, shell shocked, and shell torn. Because of their disabilities many of them will have lost heart and will look forward to the future with dread. They will feel that, with their handicap, they will have no chance in the industrial life of the Nation. What greater service can the Nation render to these heroes than to go to meet them on their return and dispel the gloom by opening the door of opportunity for them to again take their places with their more fortunate comrades. Give them to understand that the Nation that sent them to battle still needs them in its industrial life, and demonstrate to them by means of vocational training that in spite of their disabilities they can still be self-supporting and useful citizens. [Applause.]

The disabled soldiers and sailors have a right to a position of independence, but we would show an utter disregard for their feelings if we attempted to show our appreciation by following a course of public charity. We propose by this bill to instill into the disabled soldier the certainty that he can overcome his disabilities, and then furnish him the means by which his disabilities can be overcome.

In my judgment the measure ought to pass, and pass quickly, for already numbers of our boys are being returned from the front, and, as Dr. Prosser well stated in the hearings before the committee, we are bound to have some physical cripples returned from the front, but we ought not to have, in this great Republic, any social or economic cripples resulting from the war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has one minute remaining and the gentleman from Alabama has two minutes remaining.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition for one hour.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman expect to use that hour now?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I do not think so. I wanted to yield some time. I wanted to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. MADDEN. I thought if the gentleman was going to use his hour now that I should object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the Chair correct in the understanding that the gentleman has already had an hour of time on this bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I think so, several times, but I ask it again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent——

Mr. WALSH. No; he is entitled to recognition anew.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Can the same gentleman get recognition more than once for an hour in general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that a Member could only use one hour on one bill. But the Chair is not a parliamentarian and thinks he may be mistaken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, to avoid any dispute, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to proceed for one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to proceed for one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of getting this bill passed, I do not suppose any further oratory is necessary or that a considerable number of speeches which have been made already were necessary. The bill expresses a splendid idea, a new idea, that of teaching maimed soldiers so that they go back to their old life or into some other occupation, perhaps, that they have not previously followed, where they can earn a living, so that they may know that they will continue to be useful, self-supporting members of society. I think we are all in favor of this purpose. I do not think there is anybody here who is really in any sense opposed to the bill. The only possible question about the bill anybody could raise, it seems to me, is as to whether the bill is properly written or whether the bill provides just the right way to carry out the idea. I have a few doubts as to some parts of it. I do think it is unnecessarily involved in its language in some places. There has been a strong tendency in writing some of this legislation to use the longest words possible to be used. "Rehabilitation" is rolled around under the tongues of the "highbrows" who started this bill, but there is no particular sense in using that word all through it, and it does not mean "rehabilitating" except, perhaps, in the beginning, in the title, but means training, and I think the shorter word really ought to be used. We have been urged to leave the bill exactly as it is, because it has passed the Senate, but the Committee on Education rewrote a good deal of the bill once and took it over to the Senate, and they passed it, with some amendments that did not improve it. There are some things in it that ought to be stricken out now, and it really is not very creditable to a committee which has the name of the Committee on Education to let a bill go out from this House written as this bill is now. It ought to be simplified and clarified in language and one or two of the provisos in it ought to be taken out.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to ask if the bill passed the Senate in the form in which it is now before the House?

Mr. PLATT. It did. Our committee changed the first bill introduced a good deal, but has not amended the bill since it passed the Senate, though we discussed a number of amendments which we think should be passed. There are one or two whole sections in the bill which I do not see any particular reason for. A certain amount of confusion has been created by the long words which were put in this and in the war-risk insurance act. For instance, the war-risk insurance bill advocates insisted on changing the word "pension" to the word "compensation." Now, section 3 of the war-risk insurance bill provides for what is exactly the same thing as a pension. Section 2, providing for family allowances and allotments, is a different thing, but I think in the other section the word pension ought to have been used. A certain amount of conscious, premeditated slur on the present pension system was intended in changing that, as well as in the organization of the new pension or "compensation" system under the Treasury Department instead of in the Pension Bureau. You will find in the hearings on this bill, and they are very interesting by the way, that the Canadians refer to "pensions." You will find in section 2 of this bill the question is whether a man undergoing "rehabilitation" shall receive "compensation" or a salary. Perhaps they used a longer word than "salary," remuneration ought to suit pretty well. Now, if we could cut out the polysyllabic words and put it plainly that the choice of the wounded soldier seeking to return to economic usefulness lies between his pay and his pension we should have something which you understand and everybody understands. That is all there is of it. Now, this rehabilitation idea, to use the word that is in the bill, is new, I believe. I have not gone into the history of the thing, but it has certainly not been tried to any appreciable extent before the present great war. But it is not new to us. It is being tried out in Canada with a great deal of success. The hearings tell particularly about the work in Canada, with statements also about the work in England and in France and Italy. My colleague from New York [Mr. HICKS] has already told you of his personal visits to hospitals in England and France, and it is a very interesting work. It is being carried out here also, right in the Walter Reed Hospital, I understand, under the Surgeon General's control. I believe it is being very well done, and I can not help having a certain amount of doubt whether it might not be better carried out as already started here under direction of the Surgeon General than under the control of the Vocational Education Commission. That perhaps is not a matter of vital importance, as in other countries the work proceeds successfully under control of different authority in each one.

Among the saddest things of any war, I think, are the cripples that come home to us and are with us all the time. The men who fall on the battle field have gone from us, and we mourn them and honor them for having sacrificed their lives for us; but, after all, they are gone, while the cripples remain with us. I think the statement that they have not before had a fair deal is a fair statement. If we can do anything to put them into self-supporting positions, where they will feel that their life is of some use to them and to other people, it is the greatest thing that can possibly be done. [Applause.]

You will find some figures in the hearings which are encouraging. Canada has found and England has found that the proportion of men blinded by the war is very small, only 27 men out of 41,000 disabled men returned to Canada. My friend and colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS, has given you some of the figures—that out of a million men fighting overseas 1 per cent, or 10,000, each year will come back as subjects for training, of whom only about half will have had surgical operations, and of these only 500 will be cases of dismemberment. Many of the others, though retaining arms and legs, will be partially crippled through wounds affecting certain muscles, and others still will be chiefly medical cases. I will not go further into this—read it in the hearings. It is sufficient to say that the number of actual cripples, in the sense in which we use the word generally, is less than most of us have believed. The cases present an infinite variety, and I can readily believe that the work of helping them back to a position of self-support is one of absorbing interest, and one that we shall all be glad to have had some part in through the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, this bill appeals both to the heart and to the brain. The magnitude of the sacrifices involved in the European war has compelled nations and governments to adopt new measures and to discard old notions. All governments realize to what an extent the individual is helpless in the present contest of nations; he is called upon to give his life; if he manages to escape with his life, but with a limb gone, his earning capacity destroyed, the nation—the people collectively—owes him an obligation, a sacred duty, to restore at least his earning capacity and his ability for self-support.

There is one section in the bill, however, section 7, that gives me some concern. It permits private gifts and donations from either public or private sources. I do not like the idea of this reservoir of the Nation's patriotism being supplied by charity from private sources. I fear that it may have a degrading effect upon the man who will get his sustenance during the period of training from that fund. When the Government pays him a salary——

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I agree with the gentleman generally upon that proposition; but now, for instance, this has been suggested to the committee: There are some men that are now building hospitals for this purpose with their private money, and without the thought, perhaps, that the Government would undertake it. It is suggested that these gentlemen will be anxious and willing, at least, to give those hospitals to the Government for this purpose. Does not the gentleman feel that under those circumstances it would be proper for the Government to accept them?

Mr. LONDON. I would accept them in their present state—those that may be ready or in the process of construction at the time the bill goes into effect. But I would not like to see it as a policy of the Government to receive private charity in order to maintain a fund which is a recognition of the duty of the Nation toward its fighters and defenders. That is the only thing that seems to me objectionable in the bill.

There will always be plenty of room for charity toward these men. It will require charity to be helpful in a thousand ways. The highest form of human charity can never be put down on paper or in the form of a resolution. It can not be adequately described. It is the human attitude of one living man toward another less fortunate. It is the sort of kindness that can not be organized. There will be plenty of room for that sort of charity. But I do dislike the idea that a defender of the Nation should be called upon to receive aid from private sources. And then I fear another thing, that in the event of large gifts being received from industrial corporations that they may have too much to say as to the manner and method of placing these men. I would like to keep the dispensers of gifts away as much as possible. I would not like to see a big industrial corporation contribute a million dollars and then come, with the prestige given to the donor by the donation of a million dollars, and exercise an undue influence on the officials whose obligation it will be to place the disabled men into gainful occupations.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. FESS. The reason this was placed in the law as in section 7 was the beneficent gifts that are pouring in over in Europe——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Those gifts are of large amounts. Also an effort will be made in this country through the war-chest funds and the Red Cross activities, and so on, and the condition of the receipts, of course, is to be an unconditional one.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that, so far as the letter of the law is concerned. But the gentleman knows that in a community where one contributes more than the rest—in a small community, where you have one great, rich man—he has more to say than anybody else in the community. Because his gift is the largest his voice is the most commanding. You can not be accepting gifts from private persons without putting yourself under obligation to them. I fear that influence.

Mr. FESS. Would my friend be in favor of cutting that out?

Mr. LONDON. I would. I believe it is purely a national obligation. Let me make this suggestion, that when it will come to the great big work of rehabilitation, since we are now using that polysyllabic word, it will be found to be absolutely beyond the capacity of private charity to deal with it. The real great Red Cross work of the world will have to be undertaken by the nations of the world as the result of a collective understanding. There will be millions of homes ruined in France. Belgium is almost completely wiped off the map. Serbia is completely destroyed. The Bulgarians have gone to the extent of taking away from the Serbians their plows and all their agricultural tools. Entire countries devastated by the war. When it will come to rehabilitating the invaded sections of Europe, it will require the collective efforts of the governments of the world. It will be far beyond the scope of any individual efforts.

Of course I heartily support the bill, but I do not believe you can make a perfect bill now. The future will disclose its defects.

Mr. FESS. My friend will notice that the section has been guarded pretty well, both in requiring a report to be made and also with respect to the conditions.

Mr. LONDON. I know, but I would eliminate private gifts. I think they would have a demoralizing effect.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have had a very edifying discussion this afternoon, and——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think I know what is in the gentleman's mind. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1544. An act to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. And I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of transportation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on war legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on war legislation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on June 14, next Friday, I be allowed to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that on next Friday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, he be allowed to address the House for not to exceed 20 minutes.

Mr. FESS. On the subject of Flag Day?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, is it on the flag?

Mr. BARKLEY. It will not be physically on it. I hope it will be spiritually on that subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. On what subject did the gentleman say?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is Flag Day. It will be on some kindred subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 8, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Ordnance Department of the Army for a switching locomotive at Rock Island Arsenal, Rock Island, Ill., fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1151); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation to reimburse certain civilian employees of the Engineer Department at large, United States Army, for loss of personal effects by reason of the sinking of the United States Panama dredge No. 4 on February 5, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1152); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 746) to provide for the appointment of a district judge in the northern and southern judicial districts in the State of Mississippi, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 641), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TREADWAY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12002) for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 642), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8839) for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 643), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3572) authorizing the Coos Bay, Umpqua, and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians, in the State of Oregon, to submit claims to the Court of Claims, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 636), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3448) for the relief of Thomas P. Darr, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 637), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WELLING, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2958) for the relief of Faxon, Horton & Gallagher; Long Bros. Grocery Co.; A. Rieger; Rothenberg & Schloss; Ryley, Wilson & Co.; and Van Noy News Co., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 638), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLAYPOOL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3950) for the relief of C. D. Pautler, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 639), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

By Mr. HILLIARD: Memorial of Ladies' Aid Society of Methodist Episcopal Church of Englewood, Colo., urging passage of the Barkley war prohibition bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: Memorial of South Jefferson and Pomona Granges, of Hillsdale County, Mich., against price fixing and excess profits; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 8, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee as Thou art the truth, the way, and the light. Thou art righteous altogether, and Thy judgments are in the earth when people are troubled. Thou art moving to-day mightily among the nations of the earth. Thou art shaking the things that are false. Thou art teaching men the path of life. We pray that we may have grace to follow the providences that are about us. Where God leads may we not fear to follow. We pray Thee to lead us on to the establishment of Thine own great universal kingdom among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4445) granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9953) To amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5558) to amend section 101 of the Judicial Code.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9864) to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9506) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9641) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10924) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11658) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 1544. An act to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes;

H. R. 5558. An act to amend section 101 of the Judicial Code;

H. R. 7796. An act to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan;

H. R. 9864. An act to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code; and

H. R. 9959. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I present a short memorial to the United States Senate, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if that is the same memorial the printing of which in the RECORD was objected to by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. MYERS. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator really feel that it ought to be presented to the Senate with this request in the absence of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MYERS. In view of the condition of the RECORD this morning, showing four pages of telegrams and petitions and letters presented by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], addressed personally to him, and in view of the fact that on the very day that I wanted to have this memorial printed telegrams and letters and petitions addressed to individual Senators were by the dozen put in the RECORD on that same day, without any objection, and in view of the fact that the present occupant of the chair, the Vice President of the United States, the presiding officer of this body, once ruled that a memorial addressed to the Senate is entitled to go in the RECORD, I think that my request is correct and proper. If any Senator wants to object to it, he may do so, but I say if any Senator is going to constitute himself a censor of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he ought to be fair and impartial and object to all requests, not object to requests from some Senators and not from others.

Of course, if it is the sense of this body or of the Committee on Printing that these things should not be printed in the RECORD, I think Senators owe a duty to obey it. But I think, on the other hand, there appears a double duty. I think any Senator who intends to constitute himself a censor of these things should be here at all times during the morning hour and object to all alike, and have fair treatment, and I will be one of the first Senators to obey that.

I do not offer such things and make such requests more than three or four times a year, and I only made this request because it is on a very important subject, it is short, and it contains some very meritorious suggestions regarding the prosecution of the war and the conduct of this country after the war. I think it is proper for the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to consider, and I think it is of such importance that all Senators should become acquainted with the contents of it, for it makes some very rare, and I think, sound suggestions. I made the request in good faith, relying, as I understood it, on the ruling by the Vice President made about three months ago that a document addressed to the Senate is entitled to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that neither the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] nor any member of the Committee on Printing has set himself up as a censor of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the Joint Committee on Printing, as well as the Committee on Printing of the Senate, has seen the abuse of filling the RECORD with petitions, if they can be called petitions, to such an extent that it is costing the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars at every session of Congress. This practice we are undertaking to stop.

I agree with the Senator from Montana that the petitions put in yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] never ought to have been printed in the RECORD. There are four pages of them. I suppose when they were offered nobody realized what they were nor to what extent they were to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will just permit me at this point, I will say that if some member of the Committee on Printing will be here at all times during the morning hour to object to all alike, I will be one of the foremost to bow most cheerfully to their will, but I do believe in equal treatment for all Senators.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct; and I was going to say that there should be no partiality shown in relation to matters printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate this morning, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the conditions that are existing at the Printing Office. I will simply say that I have come from a meeting of the Committee on Printing this morning, at which the Public Printer appeared before that committee, advising the committee that the situation is such and the printing has grown to such an extent that it is next to impossible for the Public Printer to get out the work that is demanded. He can not get the necessary employees at the salaries paid, and you all know the paper situation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment. The Public Printer has scoured the country from one end to the other for employees and paper, and it is an impossibility to keep up the printing of extraneous matter in the RECORD, together with the demands of the departments going on as they have been in the past. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I trust the Senator from Utah will not let the impression go out to the country that that condition is because of the extensive printing of petitions in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Senator from Utah knows as well as I know that a lot of printing is being done by some of the departments. We receive in our mail every morning any amount of matter which is of no value to anybody. Why does not the Committee on Printing examine into that instead of censuring those who ask to have petitions printed in the RECORD? The people who send the petitions have a constitutional right to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. They have no constitutional right to have them printed in the RECORD. They have a right to send them to Congress, and under the rules of this body, of course, they are filed when received with the proper committee.

There is another thing, Mr. President, that the Senator refers to. The Committee on Printing has no power to go into the question of what the different departments print after Congress has made an appropriation for printing to them. I know the Senator is correct. There are thousands of tons of printed matter that should never have been printed. Four tons of print paper are used every day——

Mr. GRONNA. It is not used in the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Four tons of print paper are used every day for printing the Official Bulletin, just that one publication alone, and as I stated on the floor of the Senate the other day there are some 47 publicity bureaus——

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me? I do not want to be discourteous, but I promised my colleague and a large number of Senators that from now on I would always call for the regular order during the morning hour. I do not want to be discourteous and I will not do it now.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has a perfect right to do it.

Mr. ASHURST. I will not do it now, but as soon as the Senator takes his seat I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, the Senator may do it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels constrained to make a statement now. That is in the regular order, I think.

It must be perfectly evident to Senators that the mass of telegrams, letters, and so forth, that come to Senators do not accomplish the purpose for which they are sent. If Senators really want to correct this evil, it can be done by returning to the ancient method of presenting petitions in the Senate of the United States, and get them in the RECORD in that way, and preserve the constitutional right of petition, and not wire in and write in everything under the sun.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to take any further time than to say that I wish every Senator, whether he belongs to the Committee on Printing or not, would object to the printing in the RECORD of newspaper articles and magazine articles. I wish they would object to petitions being printed in the RECORD unless they come from the legislature of a State. If we do that, petitions can be presented to the Senate and referred to the proper committee and that committee if it sees fit can act on the subject.

Mr. MYERS. May I say just a word?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment.

Mr. MYERS. I want to make a suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Montana now, because of the fact that the RECORD upon our desks this morning is filled with petitions that never ought to have been allowed to be printed, I am not going to object to his request that the petition he sent to the desk be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. MYERS. I merely wish to say to the Senator in reference to his remarks about the memorials of legislatures being printed in the RECORD, I have examined the rules and there is no rule permitting even the memorials of State legislatures to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that, but at no time have they been objected to.

Mr. MYERS. There is no more reason why they should be printed than the memorials of other bodies. If the Senator from Utah will consistently and persistently and impartially object to the publication of extraneous matter in the RECORD, I for one will cheerfully bow to the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The further presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I wish to say just a word in line with what the Senator from Montana has said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order has been called for, and it is not in order at all.

There being no objection, the memorial submitted by Mr. MYERS was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Empires of Germany and Austria are at war; and

Whereas the Emperors of Germany and Austria and those under them have willfully and deliberately violated every canon of international law and every agreement of The Hague peace convention; and

Whereas they have violated their most solemn obligations and treaties; and

Whereas their word is not to be relied upon, and honor and integrity are unknown to them; and

Whereas by their conduct of the war and by violating every article of international law and by the ravishment and devastation of Belgium, the supremest crime in human history, and by the murder of innocent women and children and noncombatants and the enslaving of a free people, and by the willful and wanton destruction of churches and convents, and the willful, wanton, and frightful destruction of orphan asylums and hospitals, they have shown themselves to be barbarous savages, as savage, as ruthless, and as bloodthirsty as their forbears, the Huns; and

Whereas they have by their actions forfeited the confidence and respect of the civilized people of the world; and

Whereas their most sacred pledge and word of honor is not to be relied upon or trusted, but is a mere "scrap of paper": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Missoula County American Defense Society, 1,000 strong, That we hereby petition our Senators in Congress, the Hon. HENRY L. MYERS and the Hon. T. J. WALSH, to present to the Senate and to the President of the United States our petition that no treaty of peace ever be made, signed, or ratified with a Hohenzollern or a Hapsburg, and the announcement be made that this war will not be ended and that peace will not be made until the people of Germany and Austria choose a form of government and select men to govern them whose word can be trusted and whose solemn pledge can be relied upon.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the public press of the State of Montana, with request that every patriotic society and association in the State adopt similar resolutions.

Resolved, That a copy be forwarded to our Senators in Congress for such action as to them may seem meet and proper in accordance with the petition herein contained.

FRANK T. JONES,
Secretary Missoula County (Mont.)
American Defense Society.

Mr. WILFLEY. I present a resolution adopted at a meeting of the fifth congressional district branch of the Missouri branch of the National Woman's Party, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions passed at a meeting of the fifth congressional district branch of the Missouri branch of the National Woman's Party, May 17, 1918:

"Whereas the Federal suffrage amendment has passed the House of Representatives and is before the Senate for consideration;

"Whereas the President of the United States has given the amendment his support, urging it as a measure of 'right and justice to the women of America';
"Whereas all political parties have indorsed the amendment;
"Whereas our allies—England and Canada—are enfranchising their women by national action; and
"Whereas the women of America are being called upon to bear equally with men the heavy burdens of war:

"Resolved, That we the members and friends of the fifth congressional district branch of the Missouri branch of the National Woman's Party at a meeting at the Mission Hills Country Club urge the Senate of the United States to take immediate favorable action on the Federal suffrage amendment, and end this delay in giving justice to the women of America; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President and all administration leaders and to the Senators from Missouri."

Mrs. THOMAS S. MCMILLEN, Chairman.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Licensed Retail Liquor Dealers' Association of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Randall amendment, prohibiting the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beverages, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the executive board of the College Equal Suffrage League, of Boston, Mass., praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Cambridge, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the drafting of aliens in the military service, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Advertising Club of Bellingham, Wash., the Union Club of Cincinnati, Ohio, and of the Hamilton County Dry Union, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Garden City Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Snohomish, Wash., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Garden City Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Snohomish, Wash., praying for the repeal of the law providing for the free distribution of seeds, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the mayor and city councilmen of Aberdeen, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation fixing the price on wheat substitutes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association of the nineteenth Suffolk representative district, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 491) thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3835) to amend an act entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District (Rept. No. 495);

A bill (S. 3929) for the construction of a private conduit across Michigan Avenue northeast, in the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 494); and

A bill (H. R. 10891) to amend and reenact an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia (Rept. No. 496).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2653) to revive with amendments an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 492) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4000) to authorize corporations organized in the District of Columbia to change their names, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 493) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3171) to amend an act entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District," submitted an adverse report (No. 497) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4681) to further regulate radio communication; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 4682) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint William H. Armstrong a captain in the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4683) granting an increase of pension to George W. Foster (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4684) granting an increase of pension to Joseph C. Patterson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 4685) granting a pension to Mary Waters Reeve; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment proposing to acquire additional land at the Leon Springs Military Reservation, Tex., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

THE JUGO-SLAVS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a resolution which I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read and referred to the appropriate committee.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 261), as follows:

Whereas the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, known under the collective name of Jugo-Slavs, a people inhabiting part of the southeastern region of Europe, occupying principally Serbia, Montenegro, Dalmatia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, part of Istria, Carniola, Gorizia, southern Hungary, southern Styria and Carinthia, part of the Littoral, which for centuries past have been known as a people of culture, and one possessing all the qualities and conditions necessary for the creation of a strong state and for the realization of national progress and which, thanks to these qualities, have in the past had their own independent States; and

Whereas the Jugo-Slavs, more by intrigue and fraud than by force of arms, were subjugated by the Germans and Magyars, who still hold all the power in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, by which the Jugo-Slavs are economically exploited, deprived of all political rights, and culturally neglected; and

Whereas the Jugo-Slavs, through the geographical situation and the natural wealth of the countries they inhabit, and particularly through their many qualities, which prove them to be a people of great moral and physical force—as they have demonstrated in the present war—appear to be predestined to become the living wall against the Germanic invasion of the East: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the national aspirations of the Jugo-Slavs shall find not only earnest and sincere sympathy from the United States of America but also the well-deserved help in their struggle for national liberation and unification, in order that by joining the ranks of the free peoples they may become the defenders of peace and participants in its benefits, a peace which shall guarantee to all the peoples the right of national existence, freedom, and progress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show that the resolution was offered by my colleague, Representative JAMES, of Michigan, in the House of Representatives a few days ago. I now introduce it at his request. I may say that it has my approval, and I should like to have it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations in order that it may be properly considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask for the adoption of the order which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the papers accompanying Senate bill 3989, Sixty-third Congress, second session, for the relief of Alfred E. Smith, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, an adverse report having been made thereon and action indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there has been an adverse report made in that case, and action has been indefinitely postponed. In this instance the man who is involved is very old and does not intend to again press the case. The papers, however, are of personal importance to him and to no one else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WEEKS, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying Senate bill 7897, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, granting a pension to Philip H. Vose, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 7th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 1549) to require numbering and recording of undocumented vessels.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11658) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. HOLLIS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

MINERALS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 385, being a bill to provide for the mining of metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read in full. It is very short.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States or to any association of such persons or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof, any part of the unallotted lands within any Indian reservation heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws for the purpose of mining for deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals, which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

SEC. 2. That after the passage and approval of this act, unallotted lands within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for the discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be located by such citizens in the same manner as mining claims are located under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the locators of all such mining claims, or their heirs, successors, or assigns, shall have a preference right to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a lease, under the terms and conditions of this act, within one year after the date of the location of any mining claim, and any such locator who shall fail to apply for a lease within one year from the date of location shall forfeit all rights to such mining claim: Provided further, That duplicate copies of the location notice shall be filed within 60 days with the superintendent in charge of the reservation on which the mining claim is located, and that application for a lease under this act may be filed with such superintendent for transmission through official channels to the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That lands containing springs, water holes, or other bodies of water needed or used by the Indians for watering live stock, irrigation, or water-power purposes shall not be designated by the Secretary of the Interior as subject to entry under this act.

SEC. 3. That leases under this act shall be for a period of 30 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease.

SEC. 4. That in addition to areas of mineral land to be included in leases under this act the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to the lessee the right to use, during the life of the lease, a tract of unoccupied land, not exceeding 80 acres in area, for camp sites milling, smelting, and refining works, and for other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the lease.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is hereby authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

SEC. 6. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

SEC. 7. That any lease granted under this act may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in the United States district court for the district in which said property or some part thereof is situated whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specifically recited in the lease.

SEC. 8. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the mineral deposits in the ground covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States, for the benefit of the Indians, a royalty which shall not be less than 5 per cent of the gross value of the output of the minerals at the mine, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the minerals from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter on the area covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year thereafter; 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively; and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

SEC. 9. That in addition to the payment of the royalties and rentals as herein provided the lessee shall expend annually not less than $100 in development work for each mining claim located or leased in the same manner as an annual expenditure for labor or improvements is required to be made under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the lessee shall also agree to pay all damages occasioned by reason of his mining operations to the land or allotment of any Indian or to the crops or improvements thereon: And provided further, That no timber shall be cut upon the reservation by the lessee except after first obtaining a permit from the superintendent of the reservation and upon payment of the fair value thereof.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the books and accounts of lessees, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of mining, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

SEC. 11. That all moneys received from royalties and rentals under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the reservation where the leased land is located, which moneys shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for their education, support, and civilization.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the interests of the Indians and for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the right of the State or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee.

SEC. 13. That mining locations, under the terms of this act, may be made on unallotted lands within Indian reservations by Indians who have heretofore or may hereafter be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be competent to manage their own affairs; and the said Secretary is hereby authorized and empowered to lease such lands to such Indians in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit other Indians to make locations and obtain leases under the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in regard to the working, developing, disposition, and selling of the products, and the disposition of the proceeds thereof of any such mine by such Indians.

SEC. 14. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes and Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as one of the members of the committee having this bill under consideration I wish to make a brief statement. This bill was given very careful consideration by the committee after it came to the committee with the recommendation of the department. If there is any provision in this bill which does not properly safeguard the interests of the Indians or which does not properly safeguard or protect the interests of the Government, of course I shall have no objection to having the bill amended; but I wish to say to the Members of the Senate that this bill was not hastily considered by the committee. In every respect the committee made an effort to protect and to safeguard the interests of the Indians; and certainly, Mr. President, this is a real war measure. I believe we can find any amount of minerals necessary both in the manufacture of steel and in the manufacture of explosives in our own country and on these Indian reservations, and why should not either the Government or individuals be permitted to go on these reservations and mine these minerals, which are absolutely necessary in the manufacture of essential war materials?

Mr. President, I consider this a very important measure; I consider it a real war measure, necessary for the vigorous and for the effective and successful prosecution of the war. As I have stated, I am sure that the committee has no pride of opinion as to the verbiage of the bill, and if anything has been inserted in the bill which ought not to be in it I am sure the committee will not have any objection to striking it out; but it should not be connected with the so-called leasing bill. This has absolutely nothing to do with any leasing bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I am very grateful to the Senator from North Dakota, who is a valued member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I tried to say yesterday the same thing he has just said. If the Senator will pardon me further, I should like to say to the Senators who are opposed to a landlord system I have a regard for their views, and am very largely in sympathy with their views; but this bill does not propose to lease any of the public domain. It proposes merely to lease land belonging to the Indians, which is not public land.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the chairman of the committee for that suggestion. The only lands that can be leased under the provisions of this bill are lands sufficient to enable some one to go on to the land and mine it. It does not propose to lease any of the surface of the land.

Now, as to the percentage which is to be given to the Indians, the committee thought, after due and deliberate consideration, that 5 per cent ought to be the minimum. Personally I do not believe that that is an excessive rate or an excessive percentage. I believe that anyone who can afford to go on to an Indian reservation and engage in mining can afford to pay the Indians 5 per cent of the gross value of the output of minerals at the mine.

Mr. President, I hope that this bill can be passed this morning. I know we only have until 2 o'clock, when the unfinished business will be taken up; but I sincerely hope that every Senator will make an effort to see that this bill is passed in some form. If the form in which the committee has submitted it does not meet the approval of the Senate, then I say help us to perfect it, and I am sure the committee will have no objection to that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, after the word "lands," it is proposed to insert "or such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That after the passage and approval of this act, unallotted lands or such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for the discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have examined the amendment; but I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would make a short statement concerning it. It is plain enough to explain itself, but I should like to have the RECORD contain a short explanation of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the original proposition was that by act of Congress all of these unallotted lands should be open to this mineral entry. The Secretary of the Interior suggested an amendment providing that there must first be a declaration on the part of the Secretary that the unallotted lands should be open to entry. That suggestion was made for the purpose of enabling the Secretary to withhold some of the lands, either in cases where there were claims of allotment or for other reasons, so that he might have some discretion and not be compelled to open up all unallotted lands to entry. The language in the bill as it now stands, I am afraid, does not accomplish the purpose intended. Under that language the Secretary would be compelled to issue one order declaring all unallotted lands open to entry and would not be authorized to eliminate from that order any specific lands. The amendment which I have proposed would merely enable him to declare subject to this mineral entry specific unallotted lands and thereby enable him to use his own discretion and judgment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, this bill which comes before the Senate is one that is very comprehensive and far-reaching, and, in my judgment, it should have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ASHURST. Why should it have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. For the reason that it relates to a policy of the Government which that committee has been considering for the last four or five years.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Colorado—who, as I said yesterday and say again to-day, is an eminent lawyer—mean to stand on the floor of the Senate and assert that an Indian reservation is "public land"?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is in a sense public land. It is not the same as the public domain, because the rules governing the same are different; but there is one thing that is vital and important as to both Indian lands and the public domain, and that is that as long as the land remains reserved to Indians the State has no power whatever to tax a foot of the area contained therein, and for that reason it has the same principle back of it as that which relates to the public domain.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have here a volume of "Words and Phrases," a work familiar to us all, and it refers to a wealth of decisions by all the various courts of our country—State courts, circuit courts, the United States Supreme Court—all holding that whenever a tract of land is segregated from the public domain for any purpose, such as a military reservation or an Indian reservation, and dedicated to such particular purpose, it loses its identity as public land and is not public land any more until by act of Congress or appropriate action of the Executive it is restored to the public domain. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who would have the temerity to assert that an individual citizen may go upon a military or an Indian reservation and make the location of a mining claim, homestead entry, or any other kind of location.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I concede to the Senator that it is not in that sense public domain, because, as the Senator says, it has been set aside and reserved for Indians; but while that is true, there is the same principle underlying it as to taxation. You can not tax these lands as long as they are Indian lands. The title is still in the Government.

Mr. ASHURST. That is very true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is supposed that in the future at some time a large part of it will be segregated and allotted to individual Indians, who will have a fee-simple title to the same, and the balance of the land not allotted will be open to settlement under the laws of the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. The passage of this bill would in no way prevent the future allotment of the land to Indians. It simply proposes that where the land is mineral in character, sufficient to justify a reasonable man in expending time upon it, he may obtain a lease of the mineral deposits, and the right to extract ores therefrom. The land may be allotted notwithstanding such mineral entry.

I respect the views of the Senators who have spoken, and I wish to say to them that I am somewhat in sympathy with them; but there is no reason in logic, there is no reason in justice, why Senators who are opposed to leasing the public domain should oppose leasing Indian reservation lands for metalliferous mining purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, I think the Senator from Colorado and I will agree that Indian lands are set aside for the benefit of the Indians exclusively.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Now then, the Indians certainly will get some benefit if we enact this legislation, and permit the mining of manganese ore or other minerals which are absolutely necessary in the manufacture of steel and explosives and other things.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think they will. The difficulty with the leasing system is that it does not produce development. We had that question up here in connection with the Alaskan coal-leasing bill. We provided for the leasing of the coal lands of Alaska, which were supposed to be the richest in the world, and people said that men were here in Washington then ready to take leases; but not a single mine has been opened in Alaska under the leasing system. The reason is that the system is not a system which will produce development; and while these lands are in the ownership of the Government now for the benefit of the Indians, yet at the same time it was never expected and never contemplated otherwise than that these lands would be subject to entry under the usual system after allotments of 160 acres each were made to the Indians. It was never contemplated that the Government for the Indians would hold in perpetuity lands in reservations, because it would deprive the State of the right to tax the same forever. The leasing system is founded on perpetual ownership by the Government.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to state to the Senator, for his information, what is being done in my State, where we have perhaps the largest amount of lignite coal of any State in this Union. We have hundreds of millions of tons, and the mines are operated very successfully in my State. I could name several mines, but I am not going to take up the Senator's time to do so. I know of one mine in the southern part of our State, at Scranton, N. Dak., where the so-called Johnson Fuel Co. are making lignite coal into briquettes. They are paying a royalty of 5 cents a ton. It is a successful business.

I could name any number of places in my State where what the Senator calls the leasing system is in operation. It is not leasing of the land. It simply permits these people to go on and operate these mines; and the Senator knows that it will take very little of the surface of the land to permit these people to go on and mine this metal. It requires but a very small amount of the surface of the land. When the Senator says that these lands are not subject to taxation, he knows that when an Indian becomes competent, and when he is given a deed to his land, the land then becomes subject to taxation whether Congress takes any further action or not, and it is entirely different from other public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, this bill is one that relates to a policy of the Government with respect to the lands that are called Indian lands. These lands are scattered throughout a number of States. We have 350,000 acres in the State of Colorado. We have as much as 19,000,000 acres in the State of Arizona. This proposes to be a general leasing bill, without any right of purchase, without any right to locate for the purpose of obtaining patent to land, and applies more particularly—or at least that seems to be given prominence in the bill—to the precious metals. Let the mineral lands be sold after appraisement, if you like, so the Indians will get the full value thereof; then the State will have the right to tax the mines to support its institutions and schools. There has been a propaganda going on in the United States in behalf of leasing the coal lands, and leasing the oil lands, and leasing lands containing certain other minerals that are not of the character of the precious metals, but we have never had a discussion in this Chamber upon the question of leasing lands containing the precious metals. Those mines have never been seriously considered as those which should be the subject of leasing, and, it seems to me, the reason is very plain. Under a leasing system men will not go upon the public domain and attempt to locate mineral lands such as are referred to in this bill. This is a question that has been agitated only as to what might be termed the baser metals. Never has it been seriously considered in the Senate as a proposition to lease the precious-metal mines of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I may be wrong, as I am not very well informed concerning the public-land question, but I have never supposed that the Indian lands were, in the broad and proper sense, public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are not, in the sense that you can locate them; of course not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, one other point. The Senator says that nobody will go on those lands to exploit them under a bill of this nature. If that be so, no harm will be done by passing the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, yes; harm will be done—of course it will. It will lock up that much more of the land that ought to be open.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator kindly suggest to the Senate in what way in the future he would proceed to get these metals out of the Indian reservations and into the channels of trade and commerce?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will tell the Senator just how it was done in Colorado, for that is a fair question. Sell them instead of leasing them.

Mr. ASHURST. Now, just a moment. Let us bear in mind the fact that the United States of America does not own these lands or these minerals. The United States simply holds the legal title in trust for the benefit of the Indian tribe. The equitable title is in the tribe.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but it has never surrendered the right that it had to determine how these lands should be diposed of. I will explain just how it occurred in Colorado and how it has occurred up to this time in nearly all of the Indian reservations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was about to ask the question which the Senator from Arizona has asked, and I shall be very happy to hear the explanation on the part of the Senator from Colorado. I had supposed that this was the only means available to get these minerals from the Indian lands, and I realize, as every Senator does, the absolute necessity at the present time of getting these minerals from some source, whether from Indian lands or from some other portion of the country. It is a fact that ought to impress itself upon the mind of every Senator that we are in dire need at the present time of some of these metals.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no person who desires the development of these lands more than I do. Nobody could devise a way, it seems to me, that could produce the development of them to which I would not readily assent. But, Mr. President, while these lands are not strictly termed public domain of the United States, the Government has never relinquished its right to determine in what manner these lands shall be disposed of, and in that sense it is not private land such as that which I get by obtaining a patent from the United States or by getting a fee-simple deed from a private individual.

Mr. President, the proposition that is contained in this bill is whether we are going to let the precious-metal mines of the United States be opened to a system of leasing, as contrasted with that of location and patent, under which such enormous development has taken place. We did have a leasing system as to some of the baser metals—for instance, lead and zinc—and at that time the law was put upon the statute books of the United States under the plea that we needed it for munitions of war. At that very time the questions which culminated in the war of 1812 were under discussion. The bill authorizing the leasing of lead mines came before the United States and was passed by the Congress, and from that time until the law was repealed there was continual dissent on the part of the States.

Mr. President, Thomas H. Benton, the great Senator from Missouri, objected most strenuously, and made, it might be said, more speeches upon that subject than perhaps any other while he was a Senator of the United States; and, Mr. President, in 1846, after having operated under this leasing system for 40 years, it was found that it had cost the Government in dollars and cents just $4 for every dollar of royalty that had been collected.

Mr. President, under that state of affairs President Polk advised Congress that the leasing of the public domain would not develop it. It had not developed it. It had not been remunerative to the Government, and on that account he urged Congress to repeal the act; and in 1846 it was repealed. That is the one experience that we have had as to leasing metal mines, and that experience was a complete failure, although the law was in existence for a long period of time, and it simply retarded the development of these mines on Government lands.

Mr. President, this is a question as to whether or not we are going to get development; and right here I want to draw the distinction that this land is not the same as private land. The Government of the United States has always possessed, and possesses now, the power to open up those mines for the purpose of location and patent. The only thing that it has got to be careful in doing is to see that it treats the Indians fairly.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not believe it would be possible to enact into law—indeed, I do not believe it would be possible even to pass through either House of Congress—a bill which would open Indian reservations to such an extent that the individual could go upon the land and make locations for the profit of the individual without regard to the rights of the tribe. The Indian has been relegated to a reservation. As I said yesterday, in many, if not most, instances the reservation to which he was relegated was poor land. It has now been ascertained that a large area of the land to which he has been relegated contains metals. Is it the part of Congress, which ought to be and is the trustee for the Indians, to open that land now, so that all persons may go and locate it as they would under the general law, and the Indians receive but $5 an acre?

Since we have made treaties with him giving him the land "so long as water runs," how can we in good faith proceed to treat his lands just as public lands?

Now we find ourselves in a situation where we must have these metals. I am very sufficiently convinced that we can not, if we wished to do so, pass through Congress a bill that would give all persons the right to go upon the Indian lands and locate claims. Since we can not do that, should we deprive ourselves of the metals, especially when we have a bill, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, and other Senators, I am sure, will say, that has carefully guarded the Indians' rights and which does not commit Congress to the proposition of leasing the "public domain"?

I know, of course, what is in the Senator's fertile mind. The Senator wants to do substantial justice, but he fears that this is the insertion of the "camel's nose under the tent," and that the animal will get in completely later on; but this bill is not the setting of a precedent. If this bill were for leasing public domain, the Senator would be correct in his contention that we are setting a precedent to be pointed toward in the future, but we are not leasing public domain.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. May I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that there is a bill before the committee now that has been pending for some time to the effect that all the lands in a certain reservation in Montana shall be allotted to the Indians. The Senator knows that the Indians on these reservations are opposed to opening up any of them for the white men to go on to and take homesteads, as was done in the past. There is not a member of the committee who does not know that it will be a difficult matter to open up any Indian reservation in the future and let settlers go there for the purpose of taking up homesteads. These lands are Indian lands. They belong to them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator let me interrupt him? It must be borne in mind that 42 per cent of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent is in reservations. Nineteen million acres in my State are Indian reservations.

My constituents write to me frequently saying I ought to be more active in trying to open all Indian reservations for the benefit of the general public. I have uniformly and constantly written them that in asking me to open all reservations they are asking an impossible task of me, first, because it can not be done, and, in most instances, it should not be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the way in which Indian reservations have been opened—and they have existed in large acreage throughout the United States—was first by treaty with the Indians. The State of Colorado had what is called the Ute Reservation, which took in, I think, probably a fourth of the State of Colorado. Those Indians, by virtue of a treaty, went to Utah and got certain reservations there. They signed a treaty to that effect. The treaty provided that the land which is opened by the Government shall be subject to entry for all the purposes that lands are opened on the public domain, and it provided that whenever lands were sold, such as the mineral lands and placer lands, they should pay the Government for the use of the Indian fund $5 an acre, and in all grazing lands the amount paid to the Government for the use of the Indians should be a dollar and a quarter per acre, which was the amount which was chargeable at that time under the preemption act. It further provided that if a railroad is within a certain distance they should get two and one-half dollars per acre. That is the manner in which we have opened lands in our State, and an enormous fund exists in the United States Treasury for the benefit of the Ute Indians by reason thereof.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. While Congress has said that these lands are reserved to the Indians, they are not reserved in the sense of an issue of patent to the Indians. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Congress has changed that plan of opening Indian reservations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; I was coming to that.

Mr. CURTIS. It is true that at first Congress opened up reservations under treaty and set aside a certain part for the Indians, and on opening up the balance of the reservation in many cases paid the Indians cash for the reservation opened up, and then opened it under the public-land laws or the mineral-land laws. Afterwards Congress adopted another plan, which was to allot a part of the reservation and sell the remainder for the benefit of the Indians. The sale carried with it mineral rights and all.

In the last year or two a new policy has been adopted, and that is to allot all the Indian lands to the Indians, giving each Indian his pro rata share, designating so many acres as a homestead and the balance as a surplus. But Congress in the last few years, recognizing the value of the minerals in Oklahoma, Wyoming, Montana, Minnesota, and other States, has reserved the mineral rights to the Indian tribes, and in the future those minerals must be disposed of for the benefit of the Indian tribes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it was thought for a time that a treaty was the only way in which the Indian title could be extinguished, it being by their consent that the reservation was limited, but the Supreme Court of the United States has held that it is not necessary to have a treaty with the Indians; that the Government of the United States can make laws with relation to the opening up of these lands upon such terms as Congress deems just and equitable.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no desire to deprive the Indian of a single dollar's worth of these lands. I would much rather have the Government make a fee-simple patent to these lands to the Indians and let them sell them for what they want to, or let them be opened if they want to under the mineral laws of the United States, and let them be sold at auction if it is necessary. What I am objecting to is the idea of injecting in all the Indian reservations throughout the United States the element of a system that has proven to be disastrous to the revenues of the Government and also to be absolutely undeveloping in its results to the States in which any public lands are located. It is wrong by a leasing system to deprive a State of the right to tax such lands. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. There are three kinds of Indian reservations—the executive reservation created by a proclamation of the Executive, a reservation created by act of Congress, and then a reservation created by a treaty. With respect to reservations created by a treaty one would assume that the United States Government would never infringe upon that treaty made with Indians. Yet whenever it has seen fit to throw open such land it has opened treaty lands by an act of Congress, and I know of one instance it was in opposition to the wishes of the Indians.

There are reservations—I can mention one in my State—where the minerals are expressly reserved to the United States. I mention the Papago Reservation in Arizona. The Members of the Arizona delegation in Congress felt that the Papago Indians ought to have a small reservation. We asked that a small reservation be created for the Papago Indians, and lo, when the proclamation was issued it was 3,000,000 acres in area, very much larger than in good faith and conscience it ought to have been. In that reservation the minerals were expressly reserved to and for the United States Government and did not pass to the Indian tribe.

Mr. CURTIS. That was an Executive-order reservation?

Mr. ASHURST. It was by an Executive order.

Mr. President, of course, if there is opposition, we can not have a vote this morning and I do not want to take up all the morning hour. Other Senators say that they have bills which they desire to bring forward. If we can not have a vote, I do not want to consume the morning hour on this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that this is a new bill to me; I never read it until this morning; and I want to prepare an amendment giving the option, at least on the part of the locator, to either buy or lease if necessary.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I will ask——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I feel that there ought to be some developing clause in the bill, for I feel that there will be no development of the mineral resources of these States nor of the coal land. Here and there you might find a certain part of the land that would be worked because it is near a railroad or has some other peculiar advantage, but as a developer of the country the leasing system, I think I can demonstrate clearly, has been a failure, and will forever be a failure because it is not predicated upon right principles.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is it not in fact true that this is the very best time and place to demonstrate to the satisfaction of Congress the views the Senator entertains in investigating the case, when it does not set a precedent for going on public lands at all?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me say to the Senator from Arizona that that is just what we did in Alaska. There was one Senator, now upon the floor, who told me that he was going to let it go through because if it killed the dog it would demonstrate that we should not adopt it, and if it did not kill the dog then we might try it ourselves. The experience has been in the years it has been upon the statute books that there has not been a single mine developed in Alaska under the leasing system, although, as a matter of fact, they were screaming that the richest coal mines in the world were there and all we had to do was to give them this leasing system and the people would rush in and develop the same.

The truth of the matter is that you can not finance a scheme and borrow money upon the mine unless you have an absolute title to the land. Take the proposition of a coal mine up in Alaska and go to New York to finance it. It takes about a million dollars to buy the modern machinery necessary for the development of a coal mine. It often takes more than that to build a railroad to the mine. They will ask, "What title have you?" "I have a lease." "Can it be forfeited?" "Yes; it can be forfeited." They will say, "We have no use for an investment of that kind." The result of it is that you can not get the loan with which to develop the mine unless you offer them a title upon which they can rely.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That may be true; I entertain the same view, as the Senator well knows. We tried the leasing system in the Alaskan bill, and it has ended as we all anticipated it would who had some experience with that sort of a thing. Inasmuch as we have demonstrated that the leasing of coal lands in a far-distant territory, with enormous freight rates, under the leasing system is an absolute failure, can we not try it with valuable minerals where the freight rates are not so high and the products are much more valuable? If that can not be demonstrated, if the dog dies, as the Senator puts it, it will be the last he will ever hear of the leasing system, and if it proves to be a success in manganese, copper, and other things which are needed for the war we will demonstrate it in this particular bill without establishing a precedent in regard to the public domain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a very dangerous thing to put on the statute books of the United States a law under the claim that we will repeal it if we find that it is not good. We put on a leasing bill for lead and zinc mines in the United States, and it took all the ability of Thomas H. Benton for 40 years to get it repealed, although as the years passed it was shown that the revenue that came to the Government by reason of it was only one-fourth of the expense that was incurred by the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator allow me just to make a statement?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator believes that the leasing system is responsible for the failure to develop coal extensively in Alaska, what reason does he give for the failure to develop coal there on patented coal lands? I was talking this morning with a successful business man, who has a patent to a coal claim in Alaska, on which he tells me there are 56 veins of coal, averaging about 4 feet in width and almost vertical, conditions which make the mining the most favorable possible. The Senator from Colorado, in pursuing the principle which he has so often expressed, is attributing the failure of the development of coal in Alaska to this horrible bugaboo of the leasing system; but what does the Senator say of the failure of development on patented lands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the Senator will find that the patented land is very little in the Territory of Alaska, and probably it is off from the railroad. But we built a railroad up there for the purpose of opening up these lands. The excuse for two years was that those coal lands had not been leased because the railroads were not there. One of the witnesses before the Committee on Public Lands about a year ago said, "No; that will not do, because the railroad has been approaching the coal fields, and wisdom dictates getting the mines ready for leases so that coal can be shipped the minute the railroad is completed."

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is very familiar with conditions in Colorado, but he is not well informed in regard to conditions in Alaska. He seems to think that the unpatented lands are on a railroad and patented lands not on the railroad. There is no such condition as that there. As a matter of fact, the patented claim which I was just referring to is on a railroad, which, however, is not completed, but is being completed. The owners are proceeding to develop a coal mine there, and the same condition, so far as transportation is concerned, exists in the unpatented district that exists in the patented area.

But the Senator is entirely misinformed in regard to the development of leased lands in Alaska. He said a moment ago that no coal mine has been developed. Several mines have been developed and over 50,000 tons of coal were shipped last year from them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I was informed by the Interior Department within six months that no coal mines had been developed under the leasing system. Now, whether since that time one has been developed I do not know.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, the development has been carried on since that time, but if the Senator will read the report of the Alaskan Engineering Commission filed a few weeks ago he will see there a detailed description of the development of coal mines in Alaska.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will be glad to read it. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this leasing system was put forth by certain Senators as the great thing that would develop the coal regions of Alaska, and it was said that here we will get it. Previous to that time, as a matter of fact, no coal mines were being developed there. The Government started an inquiry and made such a fuss about it under the leadership of Mr. Pinchot, that the result was that everything was withdrawn and everything tied up and most of it is still reserved. There was the question of getting title, and for some of the coal lands that I understand are unquestionably good the patents have not been issued yet.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some of the parties have been convicted of fraud.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; I do not know about that. There is no question anyway that it was presented here as the great developer; the very title of the bill was for the development of coal lands in Alaska, and it has not proven a developer.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I remember the Senator from Colorado had a theory that the Government of the United States had no real interest in the lands and only held them in trust for the States. I understand the Senator is a disciple of Thomas H. Benton upon that proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do believe the lands—and I do not refer to coal lands only, but public domain—are held by the Government of the United States in trust for the people of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That question was the pending question in the great debate between Daniel Webster and Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, and was settled then, and it has been settled a great many time since by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States contrary to the doctrine of Benton and the Senator from Colorado. The United States does not hold these lands in trust for the States, but it holds them in absolute fee for the benefit of the people of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but any person may go on and locate the same and pay whatever the Government says he shall pay. It was never contemplated that the Government should perpetually own lands, as that would deprive the State of the right to tax the same in order to maintain government.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will yield, I have not for a long time examined the enabling acts of the other States, but I know in reference to the recently admitted States they adopted irrevocable ordinances forever disclaiming any right that the State may have had in the ungranted and unappropriated public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Under the form of your enabling act it only provides that the State will never claim the right to tax the lands as long as they are in the hands of the Government. But the Government really intended to hold these lands temporarily and put them in the hands of the people whoever might want to go and develop them or reside upon the same, whether residents of the State of Rhode Island or of Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will allow me, I do not wish to be so discourteous as to even suggest to the Senator to stop speaking, but I feel that we can not pass the bill this morning. That is obvious. Senators near me suggest, and properly so, that the time is being consumed without any hope of a vote, and if Senators wish to discuss the bill further I will ask that it be laid aside to be discussed later, and I shall make another "drive" at some other time.

Before the bill goes over I ask permission to include in the RECORD some excerpts, from the volume Words and Phrases, as to what is public land. May I secure that permission?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PUBLIC LAND.

The words "public land" have long had a settled meaning in the legislation of Congress, and, when a different intention is not clearly expressed, are used to designate such land as is subject to sale or other disposal under the general laws, but not such as is reserved by competent authority for any purpose or in any manner, although no exception of it is made. Northern Lumber Co. v. O'Brien, 139 Fed. 614, 617, 71 C. C. A. 598 (citing Bardon v. Northern Pacific R. R. Co., 12 Sup. Ct. 856, 145 U. S. 535, 36 L. Ed. 806; Wilcox v. Jackson ex dem. McConnel, 13 Pet. 498, 513, 10 L. Ed. 264; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 741, 745, 23 L. Ed. 634; Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769; Doolan v. Carr, 8 Sup. Ct. 1228, 125 U. S. 618, 630, 31 L. Ed. 844; Cameron v. United States, 13 Sup. Ct. 595, 148 U. S. 301, 309, 37 L. Ed. 459; Mann v. Tacoma Land Co., 14 Sup. Ct. 820, 153 U. S. 273, 284, 38 L. Ed. 714; Barker v. Harvey, 21 Sup. Ct. 690, 181 U. S. 481, 490, 45 L. Ed. 963; Scott v. Carew, 25 Sup. Ct. 193, 196 U. S. 100, 109, 49 L. Ed. 403); Id., 27 Sup. Ct. 249, 251, 204 U. S. 190, 51 L. Ed. 438; United States v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 154 Fed. 131, 136 (citing Leavenworth, L. & G. R. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 746, 749, 23 L. Ed. 634; Williams v. Baker, 17 Wall. 144, 21 L. Ed. 561; Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 763, 23 L. Ed. 769; Northern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Musser-Sauntry Land, Logging & Mfg. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 205, 168 U. S. 609, 42 L. Ed. 596; United States v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 13 Sup. Ct. 152, 146 U. S. 570, 36 L. Ed. 1091; Northern Lumber Co. v. O'Brien, 139 Fed. 614, 71 C. C. A. 598; Id., 27 Sup. Ct. 249, 204 U. S. 190, 51 L. Ed. 438); Stearns v. United States, 152 Fed. 900, 901, 903, 82 C. C. A. 48; Winters v. United States, 143 Fed. 740, 748, 74 C. C. A. 666 (quoting Kinney, Irrigation, sec. 124); Scott v. Carew, 25 Sup. Ct. 193, 197, 196 U. S. 100, 49 L. Ed. 403 (quoting and adopting the definition in Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769); Morrow v. Warner Valley Stock Co., 101 Pac. 171, 182, 56 Or. 312 (quoting Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769); United States v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 148 Fed. 884, 893 (quoting Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769).

The words "public lands," used in connection with entries in the land offices of the United States, if nothing be said to the contrary, relate to lands of the United States which are subject to disposition in some form under the public-land laws, and not to those which are set apart and used for some special public purpose, such as post-office sites, military reservations, and the like. Stearns v. United States, 152 Fed. 900, 903, 82 C. C. A. 48 (citing Barker v. Harvey, 21 Sup. Ct. 690, 181 U. S. 481, 490, 45 L. Ed. 963; Northern Lumber Co. v. O'Brien, 71 C. C. A. 598, 139 Fed. 614).

The rule that the words "public lands" mean such land as is subject to sale or disposition under general laws, and not such as is reserved for any purpose, though no exception thereof is made, does not conflict with the doctrine that, where it clearly appears from the statute that the term is intended to include lands theretofore reserved for a specific purpose, such intention will prevail, under the rule that a statute is to be interpreted according to the plain intention of the legislature. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Karges, 169 Fed. 459, 462.

The words "public land" do not include lands which are held under a live homestead entry; consequently a grant of public lands to a railroad company can not embrace lands held under any such entry, though the entry was relinquished prior to the filing of the map of definite location and survey. United States v. Oregon & C. R. Co., 143 Fed. 765, 771, 75 C. C. A. 66. See also Union Pac. R. Co. v. Harris, 91 Pac. 68, 69, 76 Kan. 255 (citing 6 Words and Phrases, p. 5693; Burlington, K. & S. W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 16 Pac. 125, 38 Kan. 142, 150; Hastings & D. R. Co. v. Whitney, 10 Sup. Ct. 112, 132 U. S. 357, 33 L. Ed. 363; United States v. Union P. Ry. Co., 61 Fed. 149; United States v. Turner, 54 Fed. 228; Whitney v. Taylor, 15 Sup. Ct. 796, 158 U. S. 85, 39 L. Ed. 906; Northern Lumber Co. v. O'Brien, 27 Sup. Ct. 249, 204 U. S. 190, 51 L. Ed. 438, affirming the same case in 139 Fed. 614, 71 C. C. A. 598).

The term "public lands," as used in act of Congress, July 1, 1862 (sec. 2, 12 Stat. 489, ch. 120), giving to certain railroad companies a right of way through the public lands, does not include a tract of land owned by the United States, but lawfully occupied by a settler who filed a declaratory statement claiming the right to it under the preemption law. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Harris, 91 Pac. 68, 70, 76 Kan. 25; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Harris, 30 Sup. Ct. 138, 139, 215 U. S. 386, 54 L. Ed. 246.

The words "public lands" describe "such lands belonging to the United States as are subject to sale or disposal under general laws." Where an indictment for conspiracy to deprive the Government of land by reason of a fraudulent homestead entry alleged that the lands sought to be acquired were public lands, and that defendants had conspired to defraud the United States out of a portion of such land, it was not demurrable for failure to alleged other facts showing that the land was in fact public land or subject to homestead entry. United States v. McKinley, 126 Fed. 242 (citing Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769).

The words "public lands" are not always used in the same sense. Their true meaning and effect are to be determined by the context in which they are used, and it is the duty of the court not to give such a meaning to the words as would destroy the object and purpose of the law or lead to absurd results. United States v. Blendaur, 128 Fed. 910, 913, 63 C. C. A. 636.

The term "public lands," when used in a grant, is to be regarded as excluding land included within prior grants. Brandon v. Ard, 87 Pac. 366, 370, 74 Kan. 424, 118 Am. St. Rep. 321.

An embankment built out in a lake, with earth from the bottom of the lake, to serve as a public levee, and still serving as such, is not subject to entry and sale as public land, though the bed of the lake belongs to the State. State ex rel. Turner v. Blanchard, 41 South. 363, 364, 117 La. 91.

Lands owned by the Province of Quebec and known as "Crown lands" correspond to what is known in this country as "public lands." Myers v. United States, 140 Fed. 648, 649.

RESERVED LAND.

The words "public lands" are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws. Congressional grants of public lands are confined to those the title of which is complete in the United States. The mere selection and filing of lists of land selected by agents of the State as swamp lands, under the swamp-land grant of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. 519, ch. 84), which had been made and filed in the Interior Department for approval subsequent to the passage of act March 3, 1857 (ch. 117, 11 Stat. 251), which approved all such selections previously made, did not operate to segregate such lands from the public lands of the United States nor prevent their passing under the railroad grant, as within an exception of "lands reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever." United States v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 148 Fed. 884, 895 (citing Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 23 L. Ed. 634; Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769).

By act June 8, 1872 (ch. 354, 17 Stat. 339), as amended by act March 3, 1877 (ch. 126, 19 Stat. 405), defendant, the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Co., was granted right of way over the public lands, and the right to take timber, stone, etc., from such lands adjacent to its several projected lines, one of which extended through the then existing Ute Indian Reservation, which covered a tract 125 by 200 miles in extent in southwest Colorado, and had been set apart by treaty for the exclusive use of the Indians, but with a reservation of the right by proclamation of the President to appropriate right of way for the construction through the reservation of any railroad authorized by law. Such a proclamation was issued on behalf of the defendant in 1880, and it thereafter constructed its lines through the reservation. Prior to such construction Congress had also ratified an agreement with the Indians by which their rights in the reservation were extinguished, except as to allotments in severalty. Held, that the words "public lands," as used in the grant, must be construed as including lands within the reservation, and that the act gave defendant the right to take the timber and other materials from such lands. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co., 190 Fed. 825, 847.

Lands in the Delaware Diminished Indian Reservation which had been assigned in severalty under the treaty of May 30, 1860, must be deemed included in the term "public lands" as used in the act of July 1, 1862, granting a right of way to the Leavenworth, Pawnee & Western Railroad Co. through the public lands, in view of the provision of that act that the United States should extinguish as rapidly as might be the Indian titles to all lands required for the right of way, and of the action of the Land Department in so interpreting the statute. Kindred v. Union Pac. R. Co., 32 Sup. Ct. 780, 781, 225 U. S. 582, 56 L. Ed. 1216.

Lands in an Indian reservation are not "public lands," within Revised Statutes, section 2448, providing that where patents for public lands are issued pursuant to any law of the United States to a person who dies before the date of the patent the title shall become vested in his heirs; nor are patents issued to Indian allottees of reservation lands issued pursuant to a law of the United States within such section. Meeker v. Kaelin, 173 Fed. 216, 220.

Public lands withdrawn from entry under reclamation act, June 17, 1902 (ch. 1093, sec. 3, 32 Stat. 388), as lands susceptible of irrigation from the contemplated works, but which remain subject to homestead entry under specified conditions, and upon which such entries have been made by entrymen who are in possession but have not yet fulfilled the conditions to entitle them to patents, are still "public lands" within the meaning of act March 3, 1875 (ch. 152, 18 Stat. 482), granting to railroads right of way through public lands of the United States, and a railroad company by complying with the terms of that act may acquire right of way through such lands subject to the possessory rights of the entrymen, which rights in the right of way it must also acquire by contract under Revised Statutes, section 2288, as amended by act March 3, 1891 (ch. 561, 26 Stat. 1097), and act March 3, 1905 (ch. 1424, 33 Stat. 991), which authorizes any homestead settler to transfer right of way through his claim by warranty against his own acts, or by condemnation. United States v. Minidoka & S. W. R. Co., 190 Fed. 491, 494, 111 C. C. A. 323. See also United States v. Minidoka & S. W. R. Co., 176 Fed. 762, 766.

Lands withdrawn under act Congress, June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act (act June 17, 1902, ch. 1093), for purposes of irrigation under an irrigation system constructed by the Government, which lands are subject to homestead entry under act of Congress, are public lands within act Congress, March 3, 1875, known as the railroad right-of-way act (act Mar. 3, 1875, ch. 152), giving railroads, which have complied with certain conditions, rights of way over the public lands of the United States, and such lands withdrawn are subject to railroad rights of way of any railroad company complying with the act of 1875. LANDS IN BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to enter a motion. Yesterday Senate bill 4404 was passed by the Senate at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. In reading the RECORD this morning, I find in that bill, tucked away in one of the sections, these words:

Provided, That the lands containing said minerals may be leased under such rules and regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

In other words, the leasing system was adopted by the bill yesterday, without the knowledge of myself, I will say, and I took for granted the statement, which was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], that the bill was for allotting to Indians lands on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation. I know that the Senator from Montana had not studied the bill in detail from what he said to me. I did not understand that there was a leasing system provided for in the bill.

I simply desire at this time to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, and to ask that it be returned from the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire an order to that effect or does he enter a motion?

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to make a motion to that effect; but I do not want to take the time of the Senate now to discuss it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the bill to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] refers was taken up by motion; I made a motion to proceed to its consideration, and did not ask unanimous consent for that purpose. I had read the bill and had known of its contents. At the particular time, when I made the motion for its consideration, I did not recall the fact that it contained a section providing for a leasing system. The bill, however, was read in full to the Senate. Every Senator here had an opportunity to hear it and to know what was in it, and had an opportunity also to make known his opposition at that time to any provision of the bill.

I am not the author of the bill. All such bills have always been heretofore referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is the author of the bill and is a member of that committee, while I am not. It was at his request and the request of others interested in the bill that I moved that the Senate proceed to its consideration. While, of course, it is the privilege of any Senator to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, I should dislike to see the motion prevail. I have nothing more to say about the matter at this time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I want, in connection with the passage of the bill, simply to make one observation. I desire to say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that this bill was also considered by the committee of which I am a member—the Committee on Indian Affairs. It does not contain a leasing provision for the surface of the land; the leasing applies only to the minerals. The bill provides that the land shall be allotted to the Indians; it also provides that the minerals shall be reserved for the benefit of the tribe. It provides further that the mines may be operated under a leasing system for the benefit of the tribe.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I read the language of the bill itself; it is just as the Senator from North Dakota says and just as I stated it to be.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4005. It is a bill that pertains to the survey of certain public lands remaining unsurveyed in the State of Florida. There are some small areas of public lands in the State which, because of their isolation, probably, when the other land was surveyed, have never been surveyed. This bill simply authorizes the survey of those lands. The bill has a favorable report of the committee and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, with certain amendments, to which I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4005) providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in any of the surveying districts of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 2, in line 3, after the word "said," to strike out "agent or official, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall proceed to immediately notify the surveyor general of the application made for the withdrawal of said lands, and the surveyor general shall proceed to have the survey or surveys so applied for made, as in the cases of" and to insert "agent or official, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall proceed to have the survey or surveys so applied for made, as in the case of," so as to read:

That it shall be lawful for the properly accredited agent or official of the State of Florida having in charge the adjustment of its school grant to apply to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the survey of any townships or parts of townships of public land unsurveyed in any of the surveying districts of said State, with a view to satisfy the grant in aid of schools made to said State of Florida by the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereto to the extent of the full quantity of land called for thereby; and upon the application of said agent or official, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall proceed to have the survey or surveys so applied for made, as in the case of surveys of other public lands, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 23, after the word "reimbursable," to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed in a manner to deprive the State of Florida from acquiring a preference right of entry or location, subject to prior valid adverse claims in satisfaction of its indemnity school grant, to any lands nonmineral in character which may hereafter be surveyed in Florida by the United States, if such application for preference right be asserted by selection prior to the filing of official plat of survey in the United States local land office in those cases where survey is not made upon request of the said State, as provided herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in the State of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof."

PAY OF BOILER INSPECTORS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to call up bill S. 2104, to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for an increase in the pay of boiler inspectors.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] called this bill up the other day I had just received a letter from an organization of steamboat inspectors. To-day I had a couple of representatives of not only the inspectors themselves, but of other employees in the service. I did not have sufficient time to talk to them this morning as long as I desired to do so; in fact, I had to go to a committee meeting at 11 o'clock, and had but a very few minutes to devote to an interview with them. I should like very much to have the Senator from Mississippi let the bill go over to-day, as I desire to hear what these men have to say.

I will say to the Senator that I have no disposition to prevent the Senate voting upon this measure. I merely desire to obtain the information which I am seeking before the bill shall be passed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it always affords me pleasure to accommodate my friend the Senator from Utah and I shall do so in this instance. I wish to say, however, that this proposed legislation ought to be enacted. I understand from the department that it is really necessary. It is one of those measures that the public interest demands. I am not, however, going to insist upon the consideration of the bill now, but I trust the Senator from Utah may be prepared to permit us to proceed early next week. I do not desire to inconvenience the Senator from Utah at all—I am not going to do so—and it gives me pleasure to let the measure go over at his request.

Mr SMOOT. I assure the Senator that the information I wish to secure will be in hand, so that the next time the bill is called up we can proceed with its consideration.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Very well.

LANDS IN CACHE NATIONAL FOREST, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 360, being Senate bill 4103.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4103) to consolidate certain forest lands within the Cache National Forest, Utah, and to add certain lands thereto.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to accept from the persons named below title to the following described lands, either in whole or in part, upon certification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes and approximately equal in value to the lands to be given in exchange therefor:

C. Balling: The southwest quarter of section 15; the west half of section 22, all in township 14 north, range 4 east, Salt Lake meridian.

Ferdinand Zollinger, jr.: The south half of the north half and the south half of section 4; the south half of the north half and the south half of section 5; the south half of the northeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of section 6; all of section 9; the north half of the northwest quarter of section 10; the north half of the northwest quarter of section 17, all in township 11 north, range 2 east, Salt Lake meridian.

Conrad Alder: The south half of the northwest quarter, the southwest quarter, the south half of the northeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of section 10; the east half of the east half of section 15; the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 17, all in township 11 north, range 2 east, Salt Lake meridian.

Robert Murdock: All of sections 18 and 19, township 14 north, range 4 east, Salt Lake meridian.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is also hereby authorized to issue to the persons named below in lieu thereof patents to the following described areas or to such parts thereof as may be found approximately equal in value to the lands conveyed:

C. Balling: Lots 1 and 2 and the northeast quarter of section 21; the west half of the northwest quarter of section 22, and the southeast quarter of section 28, all in township 15 north, range 19 west, Salt Lake meridian.

Ferdinand Zollinger, jr.: The southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 5; the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 8; the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the south half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 9; the west half of the northeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of section 17, all in township 13 north, range 17 west; the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 9; the north half of section 10; the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of section 11; the east half, the east half of the west half, and the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 12, all in township 13 north, range 18 west, Salt Lake meridian.

Conrad Alder: The south half of the southwest quarter of section 10, the west half of the northwest quarter and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 24, all in township 4 north, range 5 east; the south half of the southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 26, township 5 north, range 5 east; the north half of the northwest quarter, the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, the west half of the southwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, the north half of the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 34, township 5 north, range 5 east, Salt Lake meridian.

Robert Murdock: Lots 5, 6, and 7; the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, and the east half of the southwest quarter, all in section 1, township 14 north, range 5 west; the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter and the northeast quarter of section 12, township 14 north, range 5 west; the west half of the southwest quarter of section 5; the south half of the northeast quarter, the south half of the northwest quarter, and the south half of section 6; the northwest quarter of section 7; and the east half of the northeast quarter of section 20, all in township 14 north, range 4 west, Salt Lake meridian.

SEC. 3. That the lands conveyed to the Government shall thereupon become part of the Cache National Forest and subject to all laws and regulations applicable thereto.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the morning business has been concluded and there is no other business in the morning hour, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending that, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Fletcher	Gulon
Bankhead	Curtis	France	Hale
Brandegee	Dillingham	Gallinger	Hardwick
Culberson	Fall	Gronna	Hitchcock
Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Sheppard	Thompson
Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sherman	Tillman
Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Smith, Ariz.	Townsend
Kellogg	Pittman	Smith, Ga.	Trammell
Kendrick	Poindexter	Smith, Md.	Underwood
Kenyon	Pomerene	Smith, S. C.	Vardaman
King	Ransdell	Smoot	Wadsworth
McCumber	Robinson	Sterling	Warren
McKellar	Saulsbury	Sutherland	Watson
McNary	Shafroth	Swanson	Willey

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on account of official business.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as the morning business is closed, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 235, proposing a limitation of debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that not later than 5 o'clock this afternoon, when the Senate concludes its business, it take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, what is the necessity of cutting out the morning hour?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think we shall probably close the session early this afternoon, at the request of some Senators, and I am trying to get that agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to dispense with the morning hour. We can not tell what is going to arise between now and Monday. There may be some very important matter that somebody may want to bring up in the morning hour. I shall be compelled to object to the request for unanimous consent in regard to a recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SHERMAN resumed the speech begun by him on yesterday. After having spoken for about one hour, he said:

I doubt, Mr. President, whether I can conclude my remarks this afternoon without going on until a very late hour; and if it is desired that I should yield, I will do so at any time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have no desire to ask the Senate to take an adjournment or a recess at this time if the Senator from Illinois desires to proceed. This being Saturday evening, and with the understanding that this matter would not be pressed to a vote to-day, a great many Senators are absent; but if the Senator desires to proceed this afternoon I have no desire to move a recess at this time. When the debate runs out, however, I shall move a recess.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is agreeable to me. I probably will be able to close this afternoon.

During the course of Mr. SHERMAN'S speech,

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois be indulgent enough to allow me to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to this resolution, for the purpose of having it printed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; it may be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let it be read, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Arizona desires to have the amendment read, I will ask that it be read, as it is very short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota in the chair). In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the period and the quotation marks at the end of line 24 of the substitute and adding thereto the following:

Provided, That on an amendment embracing new or general legislation in an appropriation or revenue bill the same time of debate shall be permitted as upon any bill or resolution."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Friday, June 7, 1918.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have no personal objections to the limitation sought to be placed upon the discussion of matters in the Senate, because I can always, inside of an hour, exhaust all the accurate information I may have myself on any pending subject, and I know that in the 20 minutes provided in the resolution brought in by the Senator from Alabama I can express in compact form any opinion I might have or deductions

I might wish to draw from any facts stated. It is not that, Mr. President, which leads me to oppose the resolution. I shall vote against it on other and different grounds.

Several Senators who favor the resolution have argued for it because the majority rule is one that ought to be preserved at all times and that this limitation of discussion favored such majority rule. Majority rule is something that is always very popular; but there is nothing that gives rise to more delusions in the common understanding than talking about majority rule in the United States Senate. Majority rule is a paradox in the Senate. What appears to be a majority rule in this body is in reality a popular minority rule. A majority of Senators does not mean a majority in the popular sense; it does not even mean a majority of votes, much less a majority of population. This Senate as a legislative body is peculiarly constructed when compared with other legislative bodies which are governed by ordinary parliamentary rules. It differs from the House of Lords. The House of Lords derives its authority from no popular sentiment save that of the newly-created members of that body. They are created by royal grant. The letters patent of the King issue for that purpose. Some of the members of the House of Lords have been great contractors, railroad builders; some of them have been great brewers. One of the greatest brewers of ale in England many years ago was granted a title of nobility because of the relief that he brought to the thirsty portion of England's population. Some of the great literary characters have been knighted and have been made members of the House of Lords. It is the way that that country has of recognizing preeminent ability. We have no such way here of recognizing merit.

The only way in this country that a person can have his ability sufficiently rewarded is to go into private business. That is the reason why the greater part of the superior ability of this country has devoted itself to private pursuits and concentrated their energies on the accumulation of a fortune upon building great mercantile or manufacturing enterprises or developing inventive genius of some kind making it possible for some great mechanical undertaking to be founded. I do not know of any literary character in this country who even ever got elective political honors. I have seen some of them attempt it, but with indifferent success. England, on the contrary, creates the House of Lords by the recognition in the new membership of special ability. That, coupled with the inherited title which comes down to the eldest son, so that the title is continued until the family becomes extinct, constitutes the membership of that body. It represents no popularity; population has nothing to do with it; votes have nothing to do with it. It is likely for that reason that the limitation of the tax power was during the Lloyd-George controversy of several years ago yielded so gracefully by the House of Lords giving entirely to the Commons the exclusive power to originate money bills and to pass upon the fiscal policies of Great Britain.

In this country the Senate is the only similar body, and I have often heard this branch of Congress referred to as the House of Lords. Since I have served in it I have found out how utterly inapplicable such a term is. It is oftener a term of derision by jealous critics, as a matter of fact, than otherwise. When I think, though, of the way the Senate is constituted, and especially since the seventeenth amendment has been adopted, I can fully realize that the Senate is not a popular body in the ordinarily accepted sense of that term.

When the 13 States assembled by delegates to form the present Government under which we are operating, they had to ratify—at least 9 of them had to do so—the Constitution before it became applicable even to the 9. After the 9 had ratified the Constitution others came in in due time, but even the 9 who ratified the Constitution in the first instance were induced to adopt it in their local debates in the States because it was argued—and this portion of it was referred to very frequently—that the small States had an equal suffrage with the large States. Even in writing in Philadelphia this document it was one of the arguments used in reporting it out favorably from that convention. It won many a vote from the small States that otherwise would not have been possible—that the small State was given equal suffrage with the large State.

I do not know anything else in history like the Senate, except the States-General in Holland many years ago, in the days of William the Silent, when the States there were represented by delegates who sat in the council of the States-General and represented the affairs of the entire country, not merely by the size of the States of the Low Countries but by the number of Provinces or States that were found in all the Netherlands. That was a somewhat similar instance, and we drew very largely our knowledge of some of the practical things in our present form of government from the Hollanders.

I remember reading a very entertaining book by the consul general of the Netherlands, who was in this country not very long ago—Hon. H. A. Van C. Torchiani. It was entitled "Our Indebtedness to Holland in our Constitutional Development." That matter is discussed there very ably, as well as in other places; but it shows some similarity; but outside of it there is no other legislative body of which I know in the civilized world like the United States Senate in its representation.

We do not represent population here, and it is quite familiar to everybody, so that ordinarily I would apologize even for referring to it, but on a subject of this kind I think it is entirely proper for me to incorporate much of this matter in the RECORD that it may be preserved, at least for my own protection, before this resolution shall modify the ancient rules of the Senate. The 13 States had their beginning as a Federal Union in that equal suffrage which they voted to give each State, making the 26 Members which assembled in the first Senate, the complete body.

It is said that the Senate has now grown until it has 35 additional States, calling for 70 more Senators making our present membership, so that no one remains here to listen to the debates. Well, I do not know how many remained when there were but 26 Senators. I have looked at the record of the debates of the early Senate, which is preserved here for our information, and I find they had some trouble in obtaining a quorum then; that there were calls for quorums many years ago. So it is not peculiar to our times, for when the 26 composed the membership, the whole 26 even, when they were able to be present, did not always stay in their seats, it seems, to listen to the wisdom of the one who occupied the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Illinois permit an inquiry?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Illinois think that any larger percentage of the House of Representatives remain in their seats to hear their debates or in the British House of Commons to hear their debates than remain in the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. I have never myself been in the House of Commons, but a great many of my neighbors have gone over there—lawyers and members of various legislative bodies—and they have come back and stated that in the House of Commons, for instance, there is not a full attendance there; that the benches are empty; that their members come and go.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the Senator from Illinois know that the routine business of the British House of Commons is conducted by not more than 30 members out of the total membership, and that only upon great occasions is the entire membership present?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it is a very small number who are ordinarily present; and I am glad to have the Senator from Connecticut state the illuminating fact that something like 30 constitute the working body.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Illinois should visit the gallery of the House of Commons—and he would not get there without undergoing various trials and tribulations—and look down upon the membership there assembled during the consideration of important bills, he would think he was in the lonesomest spot on this earth. The only thing that might appeal to the Senator would be the fact that, as they were wearing their hats, if he were a member of the body he also could indulge in that privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have understood that they followed that practice; but the universal rule in the House of Commons is empty benches. I thank the Senator for supplementing and strengthening my statement. In the House of Lords it is even worse. Very seldom those in authority go out to hunt up a noble lord, in whatever condition he may be, in order to bring him in, because it would be regarded there as a breach of immemorial parliamentary courtesy, to say nothing of shocking the dignities of an ancient and honorable body. I read the record at one time when I was obliged to look up an act of Parliament, which led me to the reading of biographical matter relative to a time in which Edmund Burke in his generation was a very active spirit. It was during the generation in which Burke, Fox, and Pitt, and a number of English statesmen were engaged in a great variety of remedial legislation; it also was the time when Warren Hastings was impeached, and his celebrated trial took place, lasting for several years. On a matter of legislation and subsequent litigation, I had occasion to look up the record of the libel act as administered and decided in that country. I ran across this significant fact, which is pertinent here, that Edmund Burke was not an attractive speaker. He was somewhat labored in his delivery, but his composition, when read, was a model of the English language; it exceeds anything that Charles James Fox ever delivered, but the galleries were crowded to hear Fox. His elocution was hereditary; his diction was splendid; his imagery was attractive at all times. So the general public came to hear Fox, but few now read Fox's speeches, while not only the literary world but the entire mental empire of the English language pays tribute to the genius of Edmund Burke to this day. Still, it is said he did not hold his audience. When he arose in his place in the House of Commons to speak, it is said that members began to filter out into the cloakrooms and to get away, and uniformly by the time he was approaching the conclusion of his speech he was talking to empty benches as well as to an empty gallery. I know that in the Senate nobody can keep any Senator against his will in his seat; that is impossible; I realize that now, as will always be the case, if any Senator remains to listen to a Senator's speech, it will be his voluntary action. When running debates take place we have a full attendance, as every Senator knows, as we do when there is a unanimous consent agreement and the five or ten minute rule is applied, as the case may be.

When it is known there will be a roll call and Senators expect soon to be needed on that roll call they remain here, and when some matter involves a general discussion and more or less personal allusions, then I have many times seen this Chamber full. But outside of that no one comes here to listen to any Senator make a speech, aside from those in the gallery, except by his voluntary consent, and it is universally recognized that a Senator commits no breach of parliamentary courtesy if he retires to his office and takes care of his ordinary routine office work while some other Senator occupies the floor. I know that very often this condition chills the ardor of new Senators. I know that my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] has hardly yet become accustomed to it. He likes, as I do, to talk to a full house. I do not blame him; everybody likes that. He can hardly bear the ordinary disturbance of honorable and dignified Senators conversing while he has the floor and is animadverting in eloquent language upon various items of public interest. In such circumstances I have seen him pause. I know his habits; I have been with him a great many years, and I sympathize fully with his embarrassment in that particular. Sometimes when on the platform or in a crowded auditorium, when some ribald and irreverent gentleman would get up and go out or seek to converse with a next-door neighbor, I have seen my learned and at all times interesting colleague stop and suspend, even in the midst of the greatest flight of eloquence I have ever heard fall from his eloquent lips, until the conversation was checked, and say that it was impossible for two gentlemen to occupy the floor at the same time.

Well, we recognize that generally; but in the Senate it is a rule more honored in the breach than in the observance, because here it is generally understood that a dozen conferences may take place on the floor of this Chamber; that frivolous gossip to relieve mental tension, neighborly visits, and general office affairs are transacted; that every Senator may dive through the door to the cloakroom and return with perfect impunity after refreshing himself with newspapers and mineral waters, and that such action is not a breach of courtesy, and that it is not a reflection upon the Senator who occupies the floor if every Senator withdraws and goes about his ordinary business in his office. Will that condition be changed by the proposed new rule if it be adopted? I apprehend not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Since I have been here one of the most eminent Senators in this body, the late Senator Morgan, of Alabama, who used to sit on the center aisle, would speak with perfect ease and composure, and evidently without the slightest annoyance, if he had just one Senator sitting where the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is now sitting. His discourse was always luminous and informing, and it was not to the credit of Senators that they did not hear the words of wisdom which fell from the lips of the late Senator from Alabama. He had the right under the rule to address himself to any theme which inspired his heart or mind, and was as potential as almost any man in this Chamber during most of the time of his public service.

The proposed new rule is intended to curtail the individual right and power of Senators. How can a Senator represent his State appropriately in a crisis if a few Senators may decree in caucus and then absent themselves, leaving the State to its fate, shorn of the power to be effective?

I have never seen the present rule abused. I have been impatient at times with Senators, but good has come to the country in most instances as a result of our liberal latitude in debate. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who sits back of me, added to his reputation in this body and throughout the country by occupying the floor persistently from day to day until he changed the usual course here in connection with river and harbor appropriation bills. The country upheld and applauded not only his action, but the action of the former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, who brought his night clothes and his bed shoes to the Chamber that he might address himself with greater comfort to a theme of which he was master to which no one was paying the slightest attention in the Senate Chamber, but which the country heard and to which it responded with a curtailment of the authority and power upon the part of the committee having in charge river and harbor appropriation bills.

I see the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] in his seat on the other side of the Chamber, and I say to the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Arizona would not have had a seat in this body or his State a Representative had it not been for the unlimited power of debate now sought to be curtailed by this amendment to our rules. After President Taft vetoed the statehood bill I took the floor near the end of the session and maintained it until I wrung from my colleagues a unanimous-consent agreement to submit to the Senate the bill admitting the States of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union. Much good and no harm has come from unlimited discussion here; and to curtail it and deprive ourselves of this power and privilege, it seems to me, is not called for by any situation now existing.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield for an inquiry.

Mr. ASHURST. I have never done so publicly, and I crave the opportunity now, to thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who was chairman of the Committee on Territories at the time the statehood bill was pending. I am very free to say that our entry into the Union was largely through his splendid services as chairman of the Committee on Territories. He has been a constant friend of the Southwest.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President; and I am obliged to the Senator from Arizona for that compliment, which will go into the RECORD. Through the long struggle for statehood in the House of Representatives and here I have been the constant friend of both those new States, and it fell to my lot to be chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories when that issue came to full fruition. I am proud of my part in that legislation and thank the Senator from Arizona for his generous words, and I wish, right alongside of that compliment, which is also a compliment to our rules, the vote of the Senator from Arizona might go in favor of maintaining the ancient, accepted, and proud privilege of a Senator in his own right to discuss important questions until a quorum is obtained and a vote can be taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I quite agree with the Senator from Michigan, and I am especially glad that he added the particular instance to which he referred of the late Senator Morgan. In the comparatively short time that I have been here I remember a very illuminating address by the late Senator Bacon. I then was troubled with the same infirmity of hearing, although not in so marked a degree, as I am now, but I left my seat and went to the majority side of the Chamber in order that I might hear him. He spoke on a matter in connection with which he had great experience, which he had evidently investigated, and upon which he meditated at great length. I remember at that time counting the Senators who listened to his address, and there were five other Senators present in the Chamber, making six Senators present, all told. I remember once when Senator Root was making an address here on a matter involving a very intimate knowledge of the relations between the National Government and the States, as well as a discussion of the question whether the several States were amenable to the provisions contained in treaties ratified by the Senate, which thereby became laws of the United States. During that discussion I counted nine Senators present in this body. In that discussion Senator Root brought to bear all of the legal knowledge that he had accumulated in a lifetime of varied experience both at the bar and in public service. It to me was one of the privileges of my life, and I thought myself extremely fortunate that I did not follow the habit that even that early I had formed of going to my office sometimes when Senators were engaged in making addresses. I happened to be here, and being interested in the line of discussion that he was pursuing I heard him.

I only mention these instances to fortify the very pertinent illustration given by the senior Senator from Michigan. They illustrate, though, that the mere fact that Senators may not be in their seats does not detract from the character or the high value of the discussions participated in by Senators, who in the discharge of their duties as they see it engage in debate on matters pending in this body.

Again, the publicity that is given outside by the addresses made has its value. I know that there is not very much publicity in Washington as to what takes place in Congress. The new Senators who come here may sometimes be puzzled to know why the press and the general public in Washington do not pay more attention to Congress or to what is said in Congress. The reason is that they are habituated to Congress; it is a twice-told tale; speeches here during the session of Congress are of daily occurrence. It is not like it is outside, where probably speeches are not so common, especially speeches by Members of Congress. Other communities see them only at rare intervals when they are candidates for office, and, of course, they become curiosities. They draw large crowds and entertain the public with accounts of their experiences, and especially with anecdotes about their lives in Washington. I myself have heard such anecdotes many times with great pleasure. But here in Washington nobody pays any attention to us, for which most of us are thankful, and so we find that here the general public pay little heed to congressional debates, and Senators themselves are absent from their seats and are not interested ordinarily in the discussions which take place, but the publicity that goes beyond the District of Columbia or beyond this Capitol is of value.

The local press here gives practically no reports of most of the discussions that take place in the House and in the Senate, but the general press outside, clear to the Pacific coast and up and down the Mississippi Valley, publishes very full accounts of matters that are pending here and whatever may be said on them. So that the mere fact that this body may not be fully represented in its seats is no indication that the Senate is not transacting business or that the public outside who are concerned as a matter of public sentiment in knowing what is going on, so that they may form correct opinions themselves, are not taking note of the transactions of the ordinary legislative routine here.

These matters are ones that have been used in an argumentative way for the passage of this resolution. For my part I can not see that it would change anything. If it would keep Senators in their seats and make them attentive to the speeches of others, it might be an argument to some for the passage of the resolution. So far as I am concerned I do not want the involuntary presence of anybody listening to what comments I may make. Only once in my life have I had an audience that could not get away, and I say that with no feeling of pride.

I went to the State university at one time to deliver an address. The military officer, who was a retired United States Army officer, had charge of 4,000 cadets whom he was drilling in military life. He marshaled them all into the hall, where some 6,000 people were assembled, and I noted that nobody left. It was an unusual thing in that country, because there is a considerable liberty of opinion there and of action as well. They stayed, and I commented upon the fact that nobody left during my address, which otherwise might have been cut short if I had seen indications of impatience or weariness. I was surprised. I congratulated myself upon my development. I really felt flattered. I thought that certainly I had developed better powers of holding an audience. I spoke to one of the military students who lived near my home and told him that I was flattered at the attendance and perseverance of the audience and he said: "Yes; there were 4,000 of us there, and the military officer that had charge of us was at the door where we had to go out, and we could not get past him." So I had the involuntary presence of 4,000 students once in my life when they could not get away.

Outside of that, from the stockyards clear down to the Ohio River, my audiences have always been voluntary. In the stockyards country they have many attractions outside—vaudeville shows, beer halls, and the like—so that if they stay I am sure that they are earnest seekers after truth; that they set mental attainments above mere physical enjoyment, and I flatter myself accordingly. That happens sometimes, but not often. In the excitement of a campaign sometimes you can get them to stay. Down in the Ohio River bottom you sometimes find the woodchoppers and the boatmen coming into the villages along the bank who stay quite well. Generally they are the longest audiences you find. Out in the country they meditate with more deliberation on public questions. They are possessed of a greater desire to know before they vote, and so they come and hear both sides.

Outside of that, I realize that there is no audience that can be kept together. We can not keep the Senators together by merely passing a resolution. If you put a resolution through here placing a limit of 20 minutes on any kind of discussion, that would not make Senators stay in their seats. They would still manifest the same universal tendency that they do now toward going to their offices, to their committee rooms, such as are chairmen of committees, and going about the ordinary routine of their daily lives as they are doing under the present rules. The small attendance is often caused by the frequent sessions of important committees. With all of these things in mind, it seems to me it would be wholly futile to pass this resolution, because of that reason.

We have spoken here, and I have several times heard the argument used, of the majorities that are to be represented here in these votes. The very distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I think yesterday, spoke of the fact that majorities ought to rule. Well, they ought to, in the House of Representatives. The House, with 435 Members, must rule by majorities; but that means, reduced to parliamentary terms, the rule of a few persons. The larger the number of men in a legislative body, the fewer the men are who conduct the actual business of that body.

I remember the controversies that swept over the country, and especially in the House, every time an apportionment bill was to be passed and a ratio was to be fixed. It will not be long before that time will be on us again. I remember when the last apportionment bill was passed. Mr. Crumpacker, a Member from Indiana at that time, was a potential character in framing and passing that bill in the House. At that time many of my Democratic brethren, and some of my Republican brethren, announced the doctrine that they believed in making the ratio low. They favored that because it would make the membership of the House large. They believed in the greatest possible number of members in a parliamentary body of that kind. It finally was settled on the basis of a membership of 435, raising the ratio of representation from the original 30,000 in the Constitution up to some 212,407, as I remember now, from memory alone. But with the membership of the House fixed at 435 Members, it is indispensable that there be some limit on debate, or nothing ever would be transacted, little even by unanimous consent, if the whole 435 had no limit upon them.

There is a vast deal of difference between a legislative body with a membership of 435 and a legislative body with a membership of 96. There is a further difference between a body of 435, based upon population, and a body of 96, based not upon population—whether it is greater or less is of no consequence—but based upon the artificial sovereignty of a State, large or small. It makes no difference how great our population may be in 1920; in 1921 an apportionment bill will come up again, and if we had 200,000,000 population in the 48 States we would still have 96 Senators, but if we doubled our population and kept the same ratio we would have 870 House Members; so we must raise the ratio to keep that number down. Here it can not be done. Artificially our number in the Senate will remain at 96 so long as there are 48 States, with an addition of two Senators every time a new State is created and admitted into the Union. That can not be changed. I state somewhat dogmatically that it can not be changed, and I will add to that that I believe it is utterly impossible to change the ratio of the Senate by anything short of revolution. There is nothing but the sword that will cut that amendment out of our present organic act.

Senators are familiar with, and all lawyers have noticed, the fact that in the article in the Constitution relating to amendments is found the purely arbitrary representation of the States in this body. It provides that each State shall have equal suffrage. Following that—and this is in the article on amendments—is the further provision that this equal representation of States in the Senate shall not be amended. Of the thirteen original States, the small ones were extremely jealous of their power in the old confederation. At that time Virginia was the first State in the Union. She had been an early settled colony. Her settlement had preceded by 13 years that of old Massachusetts Bay. These two were the large States. They had borne a considerable burden in the Revolutionary War, it is true, but the smaller States of Rhode Island and Connecticut and Delaware had borne their part; so, when it came to surrendering their power they refused to surrender it if by so doing they would lose their relative importance as States. It was compromised by giving in the House representation by population and giving in the Senate representation by States without regard to size; so as each State has been admitted into the Union two Senators have taken their places in this body.

Texas came in, after her revolution, with two Senators. I remember reading a history of Texas at one time in my life. One of the two first Senators Texas had was Sam Houston. Sam Houston, so his biographer recites, used to sit over in the old Senate Chamber, rarely making a speech. He was a man of action, as you know, rather than mere words, having been a soldier a good part of his life, and one of the Texas liberators. His favorite occupation when he was in his seat was to have a supply of cypress shingles, and he spent his time whittling shingles with his jackknife, until there were more shavings under his seat than there are at a railroad station down in the lumber regions of Arkansas. Very often he was gone. He did not stay in his seat unless something particularly interested him. I refer to that as another illustration of a very sturdy character, who knew government in its primary, elemental stages, and who knew men, and who knew how to fight, and to point out that he himself was not present in the discussions that took place after he came to the Senate.

As a matter of fact, the small States were induced to ratify the Constitution, and bring themselves in, so that they became a part of the Union together with the original nine that put it into operation, by this very limitation. Now, that is a purely artificial representation. I refer to this without any desire to wound, and I hope I can do so without wounding, the sensibilities of any Senator representing a smaller State. I refer to this only as a matter of argument, not as any matter reflecting upon the States, that the small States have much less interests in many ways than the larger States. They have, however, an equal vote. Let me refer to States particularly.

Arizona, for instance, the first on the roll call of States, is comparatively small in population. It is very rich in mineral resources. It has a very active, well-to-do population. A good many of alien blood are found inside its borders, but it is a State. When it was admitted, with its sister State, New Mexico, it was admitted on an equal footing with the thirteen original States.

Quoting now merely from memory, in 1912, I think, Arizona voted about 21,000 votes. It will vote more now, because they have woman suffrage in that State, and approximately it would double the vote. Nevada has something like twenty or twenty-one thousand votes. Territorially those States are much larger than some other States that have much in excess of that voting population. Texas, territorially, is an extremely large State—the largest State in the Union. It has a very large population as well. New York has the largest population. Approximately 10,000,000 people—no doubt that is actually true now—if not more, are found inside the borders of that State. A large part, of course, are found in the metropolis of this country. Pennsylvania has between seven and eight million population within her borders. Illinois has about six and a half million.

The last three States have the political significance in the election of Members of the House that attaches to the increased returns in the census. The greater their population the more times the ratio is divided into their population, and correspondingly the greater the number of House Members; but it makes no difference in New York's representation in this body. Her two Senators sit here upon an exact equality with the two Senators from Arizona. As far as voting power goes, they have as much power, and no more, as the two Senators from Arizona or the two Senators from Nevada. This is an artificially created distinction. Ours is a purely republican form of government, but the Senate is no more a democratic form of government than the House of Lords in England is a democratic form of government. It represents something besides merely population. It is true that in our election districts the State is the election area, and the voters qualified under the laws of that State become the elective power; but the Senators elected represent simply an election area two in number for the entire State, whatever its size or however small it may be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has referred to the provision of the Constitution which provides that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. That appears in the last clause of Article V of the Constitution of the United States. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that, as I remember, that is the only provision in the Constitution which can not be amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the only one. Everything else is amendable. Will the Senator let me have that for just a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure. The Senator will find it on page 218.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I know of no other provision in this organic act that is not amendable in the usual form by passing the resolution and then submitting it to the States, a three-fourths majority of which thereby ratify the resolution and make it a part of the original Constitution.

I want to read the whole of Article V, referred to by the Senator from Connecticut appropriately in this connection:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

I wish to comment upon those two exceptions. The one relative to 1808, and to the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of Article I of the Constitution, refers in a euphonious way to the slave question. The word "slave" was avoided and not spoken of in the Constitution. It was a subject on which, at that time, members of the convention were somewhat sensitive—those in the New England and Middle States as much as in the Southern States. At that time there was no party division on this subject, but it was referred to in this more agreeable way—that no amendment could be made prior to 1808 that in any manner should affect the first and fourth clauses of the ninth section of Article I, which related to the slave trade. Then the second exception followed. There was a time limit on the first. No amendment could be made that would affect the slave trade prior to 1808. That was a limitation upon the power of the thirteen States. If all of them had ratified an amendment prohibiting the slave trade, it would have been inoperative, under this provision, if made prior to 1808. Now, following that, and keeping in mind that limitation on the power of amendment of the Constitution, the other may profitably be considered. I continue with this language:

> And that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

There is no limit on that—not an 1808 limit. The limitation on that is forever. That applies in governmental matters so long as the political authority of the Government lasts. So this was written, and written purposely, in such a way that the rights of the smaller States might be guarded, and that there could be no amendment at any time thereafter by the larger States, who might reach out and by their influence, it was supposed, obtain the consent of smaller States and thereby deprive other and smaller States of their equal suffrage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him there——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think he has made the same suggestion before, but I wish to emphasize it. It was solely because of that condition precedent, and continuing, that the States were enabled to form any constitution or government whatever; and it is a condition the breach of which would warrant the dissolution of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is accurately stated. Not only does the Senator state it accurately, but the records of that time, both in the States when they were ratifying the Constitution and in the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, indicate that that was the reason and a condition precedent that was held out to them. It would have been impossible without this provision to have formed the Federal Union as it now exists.

That being the condition, it being a perpetual bar upon any amendment to the Constitution depriving the States, without regard to their size, of their equal suffrage in the Senate, it imposes upon the Senate the perpetual character of a body representing not merely popular numbers but representing the political entity known as a State, a sovereign in many essential particulars.

I think one of the prices we paid for the preservation of the Union was the danger we are under now of ultimately destroying utterly the local powers of the States. A tremendous swing has occurred at two intervals of our national life. One was in the Civil War, when the opposing powers of disunion sought then to destroy the Union under the assertion of the right of the States to dissolve it and withdraw at pleasure. In order to check that tendency it became necessary to wage to the end the Civil War. It became necessary to announce strong and advanced doctrine upon the absence of power by a State to dissolve the Union, or in any manner to interfere with the Federal powers. So these precedents were builded up; but at no time or place was the essentially local character of the powers of a State destroyed by waging the war for the preservation of the Union, nor have any legislation or amendments to the Federal Constitution which have been had since then in any manner impaired them.

I remember reading, not long ago, the last address that Lincoln made on the lawn of the White House on this subject a few hours before he passed from earth. The question then in this country was how to readjust the relations between the lately revolted States and the Federal Government. As President, Lincoln had been obliged to set aside the orders of some military leaders. Gen. Ben Butler had made orders in New Orleans at one time that created a disturbance; and on several occasions an attentive reading of Lincoln's treatment of this subject indicates that he held very decided views in regard to it. I believe that the reserved powers of the States, and what were then called the Southern States, lost their very greatest ally and the greatest friend they have ever had, if they had only known it, when Lincoln died.

In this address he took up the question of what the relations were between the lately revolted States of the Union and the Federal Government. The question had often been debated, both in the Senate and in the House, of whether, when the States passed ordinances of secession, they withdrew themselves from the Union. If they had withdrawn themselves from the Union, how could they be placed back in the Union? How could they be restored? Lincoln's last address on that subject, made extemporaneously, and afterwards very little changed, his biographer says—the substance of it remains substantially as he spoke it—shows that he had a clear understanding of the situation. He said in effect: "It is not profitable to discuss the question of whether a State, by passing an ordinance of secession, can withdraw itself from the Union. That is not a practical question. The practical question is, How can we restore the normal relations between the lately revolted States and the General Government?" He followed that by saying: "Some think that the State government of Louisiana ought to be ignored.

"Some say," he continued, "that the State government of Louisiana can not be trusted in the problem of readjusting the affairs of the Union." He added further by saying:

> Louisiana has framed a State government; the members of its legislature and the members of its State government at its capital have taken the oath of allegiance to the General Government. Having done so, the practical question for me to decide is how to treat the State of Louisiana. I shall deal with Louisiana by assuming that she is a loyal government as now constituted, that she has certain reserved inherent powers under the Constitution that have not been destroyed, and those powers I propose to respect. I propose to take the State organization and the State officers and the instrumentalities presented to me by the State, and by using them to restore Louisiana in its normal relation to the General Government at Washington.

That indicated that the reserved powers of the States by him were regarded as essential to the restoration of the Union as it was before the war. It is equally important, Mr. President, now that many years since the war has ended, that we preserve the powers of the several States in this Union as referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to-day in his powerful discussion of the matter on another measure before this body.

Mr. President, these local powers of the State are ones that are indispensably requisite to the perpetuation of free government. If I thought that the powers of the States were to be destroyed that are essentially local in their character, that everything was to be transferred to Washington, that bureaucrats, departments, commissions, boards, executive appointees would continue to increase their influence and power, I would regard it as a calamity second only to living under the Kaiser. I trust I may never be compelled to live under a centralized autocracy that has no sympathy with affairs that belong essentially to Illinois or Alabama.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I observed in the public press a short time ago that the new railroad administration intended in their rate making to override entirely and eliminate State rates or intrastate rates. What does the Senator think of that situation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is an unwarranted invasion, Mr. President, of a purely intrastate power. For instance, in my own State—and it works just the same way in Minnesota—we had what was called a 2-cent rate that applied where the passenger rate, the initiative, and the destination was inside of our own borders. Of course, these local rates were put on roads that were a part of interstate main lines. We have very few roads that are purely intrastate.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, acting through some of the business organizations in St. Louis and certain other river towns on the Mississippi River, entertained, upon application, an order that set aside the 2-cent rate, claiming that it discriminated against St. Louis—that freight came to East St. Louis or to adjoining Illinois towns on the Mississippi River bank and stopped that otherwise would have gone across into St. Louis or some of the adjacent towns. Because of that it was said to be a discrimination.

The Interstate Commerce Commission made a ruling increasing the rate and prohibiting in fact the application of a 2-cent rate on a purely intrastate haul. There were various hearings had before Federal and State courts, and without alluding to them more than to mention them it finally came up on an appeal from an order made before the Federal court in Chicago to the Supreme Court in this city. The question was the validity of the 2-cent rate. The Supreme Court held that the 2-cent rate of the State authority made by the legislature in an act was binding upon the Interstate Commerce Commission and, in substance, that the local State rate must prevail. I think that was good law. I think it is sound under all the interpretations of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and ought to be adhered to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator that we had exactly the same experience in Minnesota. We had a 2-cent passenger rate, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, two years ago, I think, when they increased the rate attempted to increase our State rate also and make it the same as the interstate rate, at that time 2½ cents, I think. Our case did not go to the Supreme Court. But what I rose to call the Senator's attention to is that it is said the present railroad administration intends by its new rates to entirely override and obliterate what I call State rates.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; it will. There is not any question about what the ultimate effect of it will be. Nearly every railroad in the Northwest has been built as a State enterprise. It is an unwarranted invasion of the local powers of the State.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, Mr. President, I assume the Senator is entirely free from doubt as to what the result will be if the Director General of Railroads orders it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I have a very decided opinion on that point.

Now, take the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad—that I happen to be better acquainted with than any other railroad in the country—which runs to St. Paul now, but originally it was purely an Illinois road. It was built from Chicago to Aurora, from Chicago to Galena, and from Aurora down to Galesburg, and from Galesburg to Quincy. It was purely inside the State line and had no more to do with the interstate commerce of the Nation than a wagon road or a pike road. But after it was incorporated as the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy it reached out across the river, went over to Missouri and Iowa, acquired the Hannibal & St. Joe in Missouri, and various Iowa lines were either under traffic arrangements or by purchase of stock developed, and it went on until it was acquired by the Hill lines and its western extensions were stopped.

I am not prepared to say that it was illegal or was undesirable, even. I do not want to discuss that question; but the development stopped. However, originally all of this was a local State road and only became an interstate line many years afterwards.

That was a local road. The mere fact that the road has combined itself with other lines and has reached out until it has some 10,000 miles of operated or owned lines does not change our local rate in the State any more than taking away any other local right of ours. We ought to still have it. But the tendency is in all these things to subtract and take away the local rights of the State.

I have come to the conclusion that as far as I am concerned on these matters, whenever it comes up I shall vote against any further subtraction from the power of the State, unless it be so clearly a war matter and connects itself with the successful prosecution of the war so indispensably that the Army or Navy would be impeded if it were denied. Even the rights of the State must be obliterated temporarily in time of war in necessary military movements. But with this limitation.

What I started to say was that since the Civil War there has been a greater invasion of the powers of the States, especially since the present war broke out. Some of them I am not prepared to say are not necessary as war measures, but many of them make the war a mere guise and pretense. They have invaded the State and taken away the police and other sovereign powers of the State because it is claimed they were necessary.

Before we declared war the tendency of the administration, of its departments, was to subtract unlawfully, I think, from the powers of the State. We undertook here to pass a child-labor law.

The Supreme Court not long since, by a five to four decision, has held that it was invalid. A bill is now pending to amend the Constitution by legislation and vacate the seats of the Supreme Court if they hold that an act of Congress is without constitutional authority. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] will create at least five vacancies on the Supreme Court bench after his bill shall have become an act of Congress. It is a very summary way of disposing of judicial power.

I have been favored a great deal by communications from divers gentlemen over the country on this subject, largely labor unions and great constitutional authorities who get into the unions and tell them about the villainy of judicial bodies.

I read in the American Federationist for this month a statement by a very distinguished labor authority on the courts. After calling attention to the great usurpations of the Federal Supreme Court and other judicial bodies in declaring acts of Congress and of State legislatures invalid because there was no constitutional authority, he wound up by saying the moral is labor must capture the courts. They seem to have dispaired of amending the Constitution and destroying the judicial authority, so they propose to capture the courts and the personnel of the court. It was boldly avowed in the last number of the organ of the American Federation of Labor that they propose to capture the courts of this country and put men on the bench, like they did during the Populist excitement in Kansas. I remember when they elected somebody district judge in Kansas. The district court out there has general jurisdiction, unlimited, in matters of property and of persons. He was elected under the Populist craze that swept over that country. He did not know a writ of habeas corpus from a replevin writ. So, after he was elected, he was sent away by his admiring backers in the campaign for a 60 days' course in a law school to qualify him as district judge having general jurisdiction over the property and the lives of men.

That is the idea that this gentleman, in the American Federation magazine, seems to have of the capture of the courts. They have an idea that the courts make laws just because we have five-to-four decisions. Five judges thought one way on the child-labor decision and four thought the other, and five, being a mathematical majority, prevailed and made the opinion in that case.

I regret that divisions of that kind come up in judicial bodies consisting of more than one person, but, nevertheless, it happens wherever there is a plurality of numbers on the bench arriving at a joint conclusion that is inevitable. It is inevitable in all other bodies. Why should courts be condemned because they are not always unanimous? I do not know of anything in a free form of government that is unanimous. Outside of the Czar of Russia before his celebrated abdication, and outside of the Kaiser in Germany, I do not know of anybody who can make their country unanimous. How long it will continue there is unknown. Juries are not unanimous. I never saw 12 men go out and stay two or three days and nights with 1 or 2 stubborn men, or 1 or 2 sensible men and 10 or 11 stubborn men, the way they put it, that they did not think a majority of a jury ought to decide. But we have that old custom of a unanimous verdict of the apostolic 12, and we have not got away from it yet. A majority of the courts decide. Juries hang frequently and do not get a verdict at all. I see no infirmity in judicial procedure because judges, when two or more of them are on the bench, do not always agree on a mooted question.

But we have here, after this latest decision, a proposal to vacate their office. I do not know just how we would do that, just by what process, probably, we could call on the President to remove them after they had decided against the action of the sovereign Congress; but for my part I have more respect for the Supreme Court for setting aside an act of Congress every once in a while than I would have if they were of that slavish tendency that would take all our legislation here as law. It is a mark of a very healthy symptom developing itself in this country when an act of Congress is set aside because of its lack of constitutional authority. Instead of criticizing a court, I think it ought to be commended.

I had several communications from gentlemen, I started to say, that called attention to the fact that the Supreme Court had usurped this power; that it was denied them in the convention in Philadelphia when this document was created expressly denying it, they said. We have all had the same thing. I do not know how many I have had from Chicago gentlemen who have made a deep study of the Constitution during the time they have been engaged in trying to beat somebody for office because he would not vote as the labor unions told him. After they have arrived at the conclusion that they know all about the Constitution, they say that this power was denied in the convention that framed the Constitution. They are justified in saying that, because I have heard Senators say in this Chamber that the power to decide an act of Congress unconstitutional was expressly denied the Supreme Court in the Federal convention in framing and sending this instrument out for consideration by the States.

I have taken occasion, particularly since a year and a half or so ago when this charge was made, to look up the record. I have taken all the records of the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia. I have examined the records of the several States keeping records of their ratification and the results of the convention when the Constitution was presented to them. I wish to say here once for all that the record shows flatly the contrary. It not only shows the contrary but affirmatively shows in at least nine places, to which I can refer, in the Federal convention that the power was intended to be given to the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon the lack of authority, either in State legislative bodies or Congress itself. So it was only in pursuance of that original intention as well as the inherent judicial power of the Supreme Court itself to pass upon this question. It is inherent in sovereignty, and belongs to judicial power, and I think no criticism could be made of it because of that.

[At this point Mr. SHERMAN yielded the floor for the day.]

Saturday, June 8, 1918.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, last night I was referring to the fact that the courts have assumed the right, inherent in their judicial power, to set aside acts of the Congress, and that they have been attacked for so doing. That came in only incidentally, and I do not desire to pursue it further. It was suggested here by some matters that were drawn into the discussion somewhat collaterally.

The main point that I desire to present to the Senate in connection with the adoption of this rule, on this branch of it, is the majority rule that was offered by several Senators as an argument. The majority rule in this body, as it is constituted, as I suggested on yesterday, is not promoted by a limitation on debate. Paradoxical as it may seem, the promotion of majority rule lies in the open forum in the Senate, without limitation. There are small States—small in area, small in population, small in their material resources—that constitute a clear majority of the Senate. The larger States, both in population and in material resources, and sometimes in territory, are entirely overwhelmed by the small States. This is an incident to the conditions under which our form of government was created; but because it was an incident, and an indispensable one, it is no reason why any further advantage should be given to the small States by changing the rules of the Senate.

The rules have given an open forum in this body from its institution until a limitation was made, in a manner, without very material controversy by the Sixty-fifth Congress at the special session. It was provided then, as a limitation upon what was admitted to be a filibuster, that—

> If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:
> "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"
>
> And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.
> Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate.

This was admittedly adopted as a remedy for confessed filibusters.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment to the rules which the Senator from Illinois has read, and which I am very glad he has placed in the RECORD once more, was brought about as a compromise. A great deal of agitation had been heard at varying times concerning the necessity for having some rule that would limit debate. There were those of us who did not think any rule at all was necessary. There were others who thought a somewhat drastic rule necessary. I speak now advisedly, as a member of the Committee on Rules, when I say that that rule was adopted as a compromise rule, and assurances were given that if it should be agreed to—as it was, without any controversy—it would end this matter of so-called cloture legislation. It has answered its purpose. There have been no filibusters since that rule was agreed to; and only twice, I think, has the threat of putting it into operation been made, and it was not found necessary to do that in either case.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Illinois, in all conscience, if he does not feel that that rule, as it stands in our code of rules to-day, is sufficient to take care of any attempt on the part of a few Senators, by what is called a filibuster—and I have been, on one or two occasions, engaged in that business myself—to prevent the passage of good legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think it is amply adequate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from New Hampshire, by virtue of his position in the Senate, is better informed than most of us as to the origin of legislation here. I will ask him if he can inform the Senate as to the origin of this resolution?

I ask that question for the reason that the movement in favor of such a resolution is exceedingly surprising to me. As the Senator has just suggested, there did not seem to be any occasion for such a movement, and it was the feeling in the Senate that the matter had been disposed of and adjusted.

The rule which has just been cited had been invoked successfully. It seemed to have performed the function for which it was intended. Now this movement, with apparently strong backing and considerable standing in the Senate, with the favorable report of a committee back of it, comes out of a clear legislative sky, without premonition or warning or occasion; and I have had a great deal of curiosity to know its origin, and the forces back of it that gave it its standing in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. In a few words I will endeavor to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Washington.

The rule was agreed to in the Committee on Rules at a time when I was not present. I presume it would have been agreed to just the same had I been there. I think I am safe in saying that there was a divided vote on the matter, but a majority of the Committee on Rules decided to report the rule.

I wish I could state authoritatively the reason that has been advanced for this rule, if any has been advanced. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if I understood him correctly, and if I do not misstate his proposition, said a few days ago in debate that it was necessary for us to pass speedily the revenue bill which is impending, and that we ought to have a recess of Congress, which would give Senators and Members of the other House an opportunity to breathe the air of their native hills and valleys. That was one reason that was advanced, as I understood him. Yesterday the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY] informed us that in time of war Congress ought to stop talking, and that the affairs of the Government ought to be turned over to the Executive to run at his own sweet will. I think I do not misstate what the junior Senator from Missouri said, in substance. I have not referred to the RECORD to be certain that I have stated it with substantial accuracy, but I think that is so.

Those are the two reasons that have filtered into our minds during this debate. I do not know that I ought to say that it has been privately suggested to me that the President of the United States wants this rule changed, as a war measure. I have no doubt of it, and, in my opinion, that is the origin of it and the meaning of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I had understood in a general way, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, that the present rule on this subject has answered every purpose; that there has been no filibuster attempted here; at least, that it has not been attempted in a way that made it possible to enlist a sufficient number of Senators to make it at all likely to be considered by either the majority or the minority side of the Chamber. The present rule having accomplished the purpose of ending all filibusters for the delay of legislation, I am unable to find any adequate reason on the surface of matters at present for the sudden appearance of this proposed rule.

I might offer many conjectures which would be more or less fruitless, and, in order to round out the matter, before I conclude I shall do so in a very modest sort of way, I hope. The conjectures may be entirely groundless, but nevertheless they present to me some very disturbing features.

I do not care to discuss further the question of the adoption of this rule which I have read. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], a member of the Committee on Rules, has very clearly stated the conditions under which it was adopted. That being considered a settlement of the question, it seems to me it is going a long way out of the ordinary course of affairs to bring in this amendment at this time, and propose now to limit arbitrarily the discussions here to 1 hour on the main question and 20 minutes upon amendments to the bill or resolution. I apprehend that this inciting motive has not come from any Member of this body. It came from the same source from which proceed all other revolutionary methods of a legislative character. For five years there have been continually brought before the House or the Senate those methods that incessantly sap the legislative independence of Congress. There has been a systematic attack from the executive department upon all the prerogatives and powers that inhere in a legislative body of this character. The attack has been upon the Senate within the last few years more than upon the House, because the House itself is well organized. It yields more promptly to Executive influence acting through its majority. It has a Committee on Rules. That committee very expeditiously reports out a special rule to cover any occasion that is necessary, whenever the executive department desires that prompt action be had upon any question. Otherwise, the rules are for the purpose of suppressing discussion, for keeping legislation in a committee. Free speech there is short in duration and seldom had.

It is generally recognized that a committee in the House, even more than in the Senae, is a mausoleum for bills. They slumber the sleep that knows no waking there in infinite numbers. That, I admit, is one of the virtues of legislation. Most of my experience has been devoted to killing bills rather than promoting them, even when I have been with the majority in control of legislative bodies. I do not think I ever introduced a bill in my life to which my name was attached, in any kind of a body, that ever passed into the statutes. There has been so much to do all the time in killing the evil measures that my small energies have been absorbed in the suppression of the malevolent things that came along; and I believe now that outside of appropriation and revenue bills, any Member of this body can do more good and serve his country better by starting out with a war club and incontinently whaling the life out of everything that is on the calendar than he can by promoting the passage of everything outside of the needed measures to which I have referred, so that I am not complaining particularly about the fact that committees are burial grounds for the fond hopes of many an ambitious statesman.

Let it be so. In the very nature of things it is much safer for the whole country to have it this way than to make an open door for the passage of everything that comes along. But when we are told that the Senate is to adopt the same rule that the House has adopted in order to suppress discussion I respectfully dissent. The House, as I said yesterday, represents population, and the greater the population the greater one of two things must be—either the ratio of representation or the number of Representatives in that body.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Doubtless the Senator in his investigation of this subject has discovered that away back in 1806, when the Senate was amending its rules and there was an elaborate discussion, the question arose as to whether or not the Senate would follow the custom of the House and adopt a rule of previous question. The Senate then and there announced that it would not adhere to that rule. The Senate clearly differentiated between the Senate and the House—the duties, the responsibilities, the dignities of the Senate, and the responsibilities of the House—and affirmed the proposition then that it would not follow that rule, but that it would stand for the policy which had come down from the British Parliament, that the rules of the Senate should be, first, to secure order; second, to secure unlimited debate; and, third, to protect the rights of the minority. I think that was a good conclusion reached then and a wise one which we ought to follow now.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has very compactly cited, and in a most illuminating way, the underlying reasons that support an open forum in such parliamentary body. The rule that has been adopted from early times for now over a hundred years, based upon this reason, the viewpoint of the minority side here taking the third reason the Senator from Utah gave as the last—to protect the minority—reminds me that parliamentary law is in part created like civil government for the protection of the rights of minorities. One of the most experienced of all the English statesmen, not only in practical affairs, but in the textbooks he has left behind him, said that the whole sum of human government consisted among free peoples in the protection of the rights of minorities.

We are a minority to-day. To-morrow the Senator may be in a minority and I may be in a majority. Parliamentary rules like rules of constitutional law are not made merely to expedite the speed with which a majority may operate over the defenseless protests of a minority. These rules are made so that when I am in a majority the same rule will protect the former majority, now a minority, that when I was in the minority protected me. The whole system of parliamentary government, especially in a body like this, where it is not a large body as the House is, has been directed toward the protection of a minority.

It may be frankly admitted here that a filibuster, when entered upon by a united minority, is for its supposed protection. I never knew a minority to engage in a filibuster here where it was not practically united, if it amounted to anything. A few Members here can not carry on a filibuster. Two or three Senators can not. In fact, if there was not a considerable number, or nearly a united minority, the minority had as well not undertake to carry on the filibuster for practical results; and even then it is limited to a certain time. It is understood when the automatic adjournment comes at the closing hours of the biennial period for which we were created, then in the closing hours men may take the floor and consume the time until, automatically, final adjournment has occurred and legislation is defeated. I have known of no filibusters that succeeded in accomplishing results of any practical character outside of those periods and outside of the united opposition of a minority.

I will go further than that, Mr. President, and state that the successful filibusters have always had some sympathy of some of the members of the majority party, almost without exception. The majority party has had one to seven members since I have been here who were in sympathy with the purpose to be obtained by the filibuster, whether they took part in it or not. It is probably one of the defenses of the minority, in addition to the rules of a parliamentary character and constitutional restrictions and statutes, that even a majority party on matters that are not of a purely political character invariably have some independent thought within their own ranks.

The minority side of the Chamber here has had a very great deal of independent thought within the last seven or eight years within its own ranks, and probably the majority may now credit their administration to the fact that there was a widespread revolt inside of the Republican Party upon certain admitted matters not only of party management but upon matters of legislation and upon the general result attained by the party then in power. So the fact that there is always within the party ranks one or more members or a considerable body of voters is in itself a protection of the country against the alleged evils of a political party long continuing in power, or against what is said to be its tyranny or its improper conduct. The very fact that these divisions come gives to the minority additional protection to the rules that have been referred to.

Now, with these elemental reasons for the protection of a minority in this way, keeping them in mind, and what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has added as to the adoption of the rule at the special session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, I recur again to the size of the different States and the effect that they have upon the larger States. The only filibuster here that I remember that was really effective in a matter of general legislation was the shipping bill. It is true that the armed merchant neutrality act was defeated finally some time ago by certain Senators who were opposed to it by using time at the expiration of Congress that denied a roll call upon a certain matter.

I remember that I signed a round robin with a number of other Senators favoring that legislation. I was not with the filibuster on that, but I recognized that the Senators were within their rights according to the rules of the Senate in that action.

I do not care to pursue that subject; but long before we ever thought that we would declare war or that we would have any such momentous question on our hands as we have now there was an attempt made to pass a shipping bill at the end of the congressional session. At that time most Republicans regarded it as the substitute for a method of granting subsidies to merchant shipping, and many gentlemen on the floor here declared themselves in favor of a direct subsidy. We argued the question on the basis that the merchant shipping bill was itself a subsidy with some aggravated features, such as Government ownership, and that we ourselves would prefer to vote direct for a subsidy rather than the measure. I know that a good deal of argument was devoted to that phase of the question. But it proceeded in that way, and frankly the minority party, together with certain of the majority Senators who were opposed to the bill, tried to beat it by a filibuster, and finally it succeeded. The filibuster came from the minority side.

A great deal of bitter criticism went over the country, some in the press and some from those in charge of the legislation, and some came from the executive department. On that measure I made a somewhat exhaustive analysis of the effect of a filibuster on legislation. Taking this shipping bill as a matter of general legislation and a fair test, I analyzed the vote on the preliminary measures that indicated about the way the bill would have been voted on if it had succeeded in reaching a roll call.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. At that point will the Senator permit me to suggest that in addition to the reasons he has given for the opposition of the minority, aided by a portion of the majority Senators, there was a very strong suspicion in the public mind and in the mind of many Senators that if that bill passed it would result in the purchase of the interned German ships at our ports, and that fact had very great weight in the minds of many Senators in thinking that the legislation should not be enacted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the Senator is correct. That was very generally discussed even in the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator might have gone a little further and stated that had an amendment which eliminated the purchase of those interned ships passed the Senate, and there was an attempt to put it through several times, there would have been no filibuster.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is correct. I am sure that what the Senator from North Dakota has said was a very controlling motive here, because there was a well-founded belief based upon much accessible evidence that there was a plan on foot to purchase the interned ships.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to add to what the Senator from North Dakota has said that that bill in its original form, about the German interned ships, providing for their acquisition and payment by the Government, was prepared and recommended by one of the departments of the Government. I was opposed to it from the beginning. I thought the only way to do was to take the ships and leave the question of whether we ought to pay for them until the end of the war, and that was finally the attitude taken by the Senate. I simply rose to remind the Senator of the fact that that bill in its obnoxious form, as I call it, and as the Senator from North Dakota, too, seems to view it, was prepared by one of the departments of the Government and sent up in that form.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad the Senator from Minnesota added that. I did not have that information myself, and it is very useful to have it in the RECORD as an additional reason why the filibuster I referred to was undertaken.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I might add one word more. That is not all, but an official of one of the departments appeared before the Judiciary Committee to advocate the passage of that bill in its original form.

Mr. SHERMAN. This adds more, and I welcome it. This was the last filibuster ever of a practical character affecting general legislation that we have had. When we take the record of what we had done, together with this amendment on the right of debate that I have already read into the RECORD, it seems to me that we have all practical measures to facilitate legislation or even to expedite the ratification of treaties in the event any should occur.

I went to some trouble after the criticism made of the filibuster referred to on the shipping bill in analyzing the effect of the cloture rule on the deliberations of this body. I came to the conclusion that the paradox I stated a while ago was literally true, that the open forum in the Senate is an ally of the majority of the people of the United States. It is an antagonist of a combination of small States to control a majority of the population of the Union.

That is literally true, Mr. President, as can be demonstrated with mathematical accuracy by the returns of the Census Department as well as by the vote taken on the shipping bill in this Chamber—that is, upon preliminary measures leading up to the shipping bill, because the vote on its passage was never taken.

Senators here, and among them the very capable Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], with whom I agree on many things, said that they were for this amendment because it promoted the rule of the majority. I am moved to inquire a majority of what? If it promotes the rule of a majority of States, the Senator from Oklahoma is correct. If it promotes the rule of a majority of the people of the United States, he is inaccurate, because the latter is far from being the truth. It promotes the rule of the majority of the States apparently, but in fact so long as there are conferences it promotes the rule of the majority in the conference. It is much more euphonious nowadays to speak of a conference than it is of a caucus. Caucus became unpopular a good deal like a great many things that have been criticized by the public press and by magazines. People are loth to use the right names for descriptive purposes, but I see no difference between a conference now and a caucus. It possesses all the badges of authority, it contains all the stalwart binding ties that appeal to persons who desire to be regular in their party that a caucus did.

When we speak of a majority acting representing States it becomes eventually a majority of the smaller States, a combination of the Senators, and it is even worse than that. The other States can take care of themselves in many instances, but a combination that leaves out the smaller States of the Union reduces to a state of absolute impotency in this body the smaller States. They are without the ability to protect themselves unless they can join with the larger States. On political subjects they can not do so.

Therefore, when a smaller State is defeated in a conference or is ostracized in a caucus, the smaller State inside of its own party ranks becomes a victim of a brutal majority of its own party and is without a remedy, because ordinarily on political matters they refrain from joining with the other States or with the minority party in order to protect themselves. So the small State itself is interested in the open forum.

There is no other body in the United States that does not have a cloture. This is the only place left. It is also the only kind of a legislative body of this kind for the entire country. No State has any such body and no city council has it in the larger cities of the country.

The House has long since ceased to be a deliberative body. The Speaker four years ago in the House said that you could not run the House as a town meeting. Everybody knows that. But the Committee on Rules does run it to suit the Speaker. In the nature of things that must be so. But there is no essential difference to-day in the management of the House and its management when Reed was Speaker years ago. The Reed rules are equally efficient to-day. The Committee on Rules can report out anything. They can report out a rule that a measure shall be taken up at 12 o'clock noon, that it shall be discussed for one hour, that amendments shall not be offered, and that no motion shall be in order save that of laying on the table, and that a motion to commit shall not be in order or put all kinds of parliamentary essentials in the motion. There is no limit to what the Committee on Rules can do. As a matter of fact, if you search the records of the House it is found very many convenient rules of that kind have been reported and have been acted on. Legislation has been promoted, expedited in its passage, by rules of the kind I have referred to.

The House is in the same condition that the delegate from Texas was at one time in a national convention. Somebody said there was no rule for the method of selecting delegates in that way, and one very candid gentleman from over in western Texas said, "The gentleman is mistaken, because before we selected the delegates that way we passed a rule every time to authorize it." That is the way the House does. They always do it in a parliamentary way, and the rule is made to fit the emergency.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Doubtless it has been suggested to the mind of the Senator from Illinois that if we adopt the cloture rule which is now proposed, at some hysterical period in our history we will be asked to go as far as the House is going in the matter of reporting rules, hedged about as they are with every possible provision to prevent debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. It is easy enough, if the precedent is once made, to cut it to half an hour or to prevent it altogether, to apply the previous question. When the ancient rule that has kept this as an open forum for these years has once been broken down and limitations placed on it it is a very easy matter indeed to remove the limitation, and the Senate will find itself in the same condition that the House is. When that is done it ceases to be a deliberative body. It is simply then a question of a certain number transacting the business of the Senate.

I wish to refer here to some of these combinations of States. For instance, on the shipping bill 21 States, the States of Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, and, at that time, Indiana, which was represented by two Democratic Senators and was classified with this list, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, making 21 States, were the States that furnished the great bulk of the support for the shipping bill. There are 42 Senators in the 21 States. There were 36 Democratic Senators of the majority who voted for the shipping bill in its various parliamentary stages whenever a roll call was had upon questions where a test could be taken, and there were 6 out of the 42 who voted against it. Of the 6 Senators so voting against the bill in these preliminary matters 5 of them were of the majority side of the Chamber from the normally Democratic States of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, and Mississippi, and one a Republican, from the doubtful State of Delaware. That is the first group of States—21.

I take then another group of States of 18, containing 36 Senators. The States are Connecticut, Iowa, Minnesota, New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Idaho, Kansas, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Rhode Island, Washington, Illinois, Michigan, New Mexico, Ohio, Utah, and Wyoming. At that time New Mexico was represented by two Republicans and was brought in the classification of the second group of 18 States just as Indiana, being then represented by two of the majority side of the Chamber, was placed in the first group of 21 States.

Of these 36 Senators from the 18 States, 30 Republicans voted against the bill in all its parliamentary stages where a roll call was had, and 4 Democrats, one each from the States of Illinois, Kansas, New Hampshire, and Ohio, all of which ordinarily are Republican States and were carried in 1914—some of them lost in 1916—voted for the bill. One from the State of Washington, which is ordinarily of the minority politics, voted against it in some of its stages.

I never felt justified in stating how the vote would have been cast if it had proceeded to a final roll call. One Democrat from the State of New York voted against the bill. This leaves 9 States in the 48—21 in the first group and 18 in the second, making 39—and, of these 9 States remaining, California, Massachusetts, Oregon, Colorado, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Maine, South Dakota, and West Virginia had 18 Senators, of whom 9 Republicans and 1 Democrat voted against the shipping bill in all the stages, as I have explained, and 6 Democrats and 2 Republicans voted for it. The 9 Republicans were from California, Maine, Massachusetts, South Dakota, Wisconsin, and West Virginia, and the 1 Democrat was from Nebraska. The 6 Democrats who voted for it were from Colorado, Maine, Oregon, and West Virginia, and the 2 Republicans were 1 each from Nebraska and Wisconsin.

For the purpose of testing the popular strength that lies back of a measure of this kind beaten by a filibuster, Mr. President, it is instructive to note the voting population of these States. I take the first group of 21 States, and for the purposes of this analysis, Indiana then being represented by its two majority Senators on that side of the Chamber, I regard certain other States as Democratic. There are eight of them, however, that are fighting ground, including Indiana—since Republican—Delaware, Missouri, Montana, Kentucky, Nevada, Maryland, and New Jersey. New Jersey is inclined to be classified now with the minority party of this Chamber based upon recent elections. Maryland shows a strong disturbing tendency toward the majority party of like kind. Indiana has ceased to afford consolation to the majority party in the last test that was made, but to say the least of it this is a very liberal classification as it is read.

The total population of these 21 States by the census of 1910 is 37,000,000 in round numbers. The total vote cast in the 21 States in 1912 was 4,314,496. The total Democratic vote cast in 1912 in these States was 2,339,191.

I take the second group of 18 States with the tabulation. I regard them as ordinarily Republican in normal conditions. The larger States of the Union lie in the second group. It is significant, too, that the four largest States of the Union are in that classification. The latter comprise the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio. I take none of the female votes in the States where they were permitted to vote. This is entirely a classification of the male vote of the States. The total population of 18 States is 41,000,000 and over, and the total vote cast is 7,900,000. The total Republican vote cast in the 18 States in 1912 was 4,398,000.

In the third group of States are five that elected Democratic Senators in 1914 by direct vote of the people—California, Oregon, Colorado, Wisconsin, and South Dakota. I omit any particular reference to California in view of what occurred there in 1914, as well as in 1916, because it may accurately be described as a mixed return or a mixed result. The factional differences in South Dakota, of which the Presiding Officer [Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota in the chair] has an intimate knowledge, as well as in Wisconsin, gave the election to the Democratic senatorial candidates by pluralities, and personal popularity in Oregon elected the present Democratic incumbent from that State, while all three of the three congressional districts in Oregon elected Republicans that year.

The total population of the nine States is 13,289,000, and the total vote cast in those States was 2,729,000. The total Democratic vote was 1,104,000; the total Taft and Roosevelt vote cast in 1912 was 1,337,000.

Now, let me take the first group of Senators based on population and compare it with the second group. The 36 Democratic Senators in the first group of States voting for the shipping bill represented a population of 37,000,000, and the 30 Republican Senators and 1 Progressive Senator in the second group voting against the bill represented a population of 41,000,000; or the 30 Republicans and 1 Progressive Senator at that time of the second group voting against the bill represented a population exceeding that which the first group represented, having 36 Democratic Senators, voting for the bill, by over 4,000,000 population. That was a filibuster, and the 36 Senators out of the 42 representing the 21 States which almost solidly supported the shipping bill had 37,000,000 population, as compared with 41,000,000 population for the 30 Senators in the 18 States voting against the bill.

Can it be said that it is promoting the rule of the majority to stop in this body by a limitation upon the open floor the discussion to promote the rule of 37,000,000 people over 40,000,000? That is not the way majorities rule in democracies. I do not want to argue it entirely on the basis that we are a democracy. We are not a pure democracy. Russia is a pure democracy to-day. I do not know whether it is much of a recommendation, but the people who are active rule. Just how active a man has to be in Russia to be a majority depends upon his destructive abilities, not upon the mere matter of voting or getting out under a tree, as they did in ancient times, and making themselves heard; but a pure democracy has no restraints upon the rule of the majority. They may decide one thing to be the law to-day, or through representative bodies they may pass a certain rule to-day and to-morrow they may revoke the rule. Another majority may be in next year and it may revoke every law, every restriction upon property or personal rights or for their protection, and it may utterly destroy the rights of the former majority. Ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, the repeal of all the methods by which institutional liberty is guarded may be trampled underfoot by a victorious and aggressive majority next year. The majority of to-day next year may become the helpless victim. That is a pure democracy.

Mr. President, the total vote in the first group of States is 4,314,000; the total vote in the second group of States is 7,987,000. It comes within very nearly being double as many. If, to follow the argument of the Senator from Oklahoma, the majority means votes, then the majority by senatorial votes in this body applying a limitation upon the right of debate does not promote the rule of a majority of votes; it promotes the rule of a minority of votes; it promotes the denial of the right of a majority of votes even to be heard, much less to vote.

No complaint can be made in a parliamentary or in a legal way of this condition which we find ourselves facing now, because, for reasons indicated yesterday evening, we are so constituted in this body that that discrepancy between representation and population or vote occurs here, so that with nearly 4,000,000 of a difference in population, with nearly double as many votes in 18 States represented by the 30 Senators voting against this bill, which was killed by a filibuster, it was a decided majority of population and a much more decided majority of votes that backed the men who engaged in the filibuster in this body. So it is not a majority referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma, either upon population or votes, that conducted the filibuster here for the purpose of protecting itself against the enactment of the measure.

I will omit any discussion of the 9 remaining States. Of the third group I want to subdivide the 21 solidly Democratic States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida—11 out of the 21—Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia—the 11 constitute a majority of the 21. They had 22 Senators out of the total of 44 on the vote I have analyzed, and under party caucus action they rule absolutely the great group of Democratic States in this body and elsewhere on legislation. Those 11 States contain a population of 22,392,414, and the total vote cast in the 11 States in 1912 was 1,540,514, or less than 7 per cent of the total population; to be accurate, it was 6.88 per cent of the population of the 11 States that voted.

If popular government is invoked to help the shipping bill, therefore, Mr. President, let me compare these 11 States with 11 other States in the Union, to wit, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Minnesota, Connecticut, Michigan, Kansas, North Dakota, Iowa, and Washington. Those are all States of group 2. They have an aggregate population of 38,819,840 to be pitted against the 22,392,414 of the 11 States in group 1. The 11 States in group 1 absolutely control in caucus action or in conference the proceedings and the deliberations of the rest of this body on the majority side.

It can not be said that the cloture rule, or a limitation upon the rule of the open forum here, promotes the rule of the majority of population if one group of 11 States is compared with the other group. On the contrary, it suppresses the rule of the majority on both the population and votes. The protection against that is the right of filibuster as it has heretofore existed and as limited by the adoption of the rule at the special session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. That limitation has practically prevented any filibuster from then up to this time. No filibuster has been carried or attempted to be carried into execution. So it seems to me that that puts the subject in a very practical way at rest.

The 11 Republican States—now leaving the population and going to the vote—cast a total vote of 7,447,089, or over 19 per cent of their total population. If it be a matter of majorities, I pit the majority of less than 7 per cent voting of the 11 States in the first group against more than 19 per cent of the 11 States in the second group voting, and I again inquire whether it promotes the rule of the majority of voters even to take away from a minority of Senators here, whether it be the minority on this side or on some future occasion the minority on the other side of the Chamber, the right to protect themselves by delay in legislation.

I can remember long before I had any practical knowledge of such matters when the then minority side of this Chamber protected themselves against many of what they considered burdensome acts of legislation by a filibuster. It was then done here repeatedly by the minority side of the Chamber. It was not seriously attempted by the majority side of the Chamber to change the rule. They knew what the rule had been from time immemorial and the reason for its adoption, which was so cogently stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] in the three propositions which he laid down. So, rather than fly to the greater evil of abolishing the open forum the majority party here abided by the right of the minority to check by filibuster the progress of legislation. So, when it comes to a question of popular government, not arguing the legal right or the parliamentary status of this body under the constitutional limitations, when it comes to a question of appeal beyond that to an outside sentiment, and saying the popular rule demands the abolition of the open forum, I reply to that, Mr. President, the open forum here is the ally and support of popular government both in the majority of population and in a majority of votes, while the cloture is an ally of minorities both on votes and population.

There is no popular majority such as the National League for Popular Government, every time they have their annual meeting, insist shall be the rule for this country. They wish a pure democracy. In that sense—and I apprehend it is in that sense that the Senator from Oklahoma spoke—there is no majority back of a limitation upon the right of debate in this body. Such a limitation becomes promotive of the rule of minorities of population and of voters.

Another feature that is incidental to this, Mr. President, is that cloture or the limitation of the right of debate in the Senate when applied to the larger States is destructive of the representation that otherwise might be had. The two Senators from a large State are equally powerful with the Senators from a small State or a number of Senators, because under the rule they can delay legislation at the end of a session. New York has something like 10,000,000 population, and it cast in 1912 1,587,000 votes. If I compare that vote, as I mentioned yesterday, with the vote of Nevada, it can be seen how much advantage the small State has in this body. If it can apply the previous question and bring the body to a vote, then the small State absolutely controls the country; there is no escape from

it. And not only that, but whenever a small State is not within the powerful circle of caucus action or conference proceedings, then the small State can be absolutely obliterated in the sum total of governmental affairs. There is no help for it; we can not change it. In order that we might escape some of these evil results, the open forum rule was adopted and has prevailed down to the time of the limitation inaugurated at the beginning of this Congress, which keeps any very obvious evil from being perpetrated.

In the scheme of the Federal Government, it being impossible except it be done by the sword to amend the constitutional provision for equal suffrage in the Senate, the filibuster was one of the methods adopted to overcome the unfair action taken in caucus proceedings. It is another method of overcoming the influence of the Executive that has, without regard to the party that is in control of that office, insidiously invaded the local province of the States for many, many years and is now making more rapid strides in that direction than at any other time in the history of the country.

There is no such thing as a pure democracy in this country outside of the States, and none of them, Mr. President, that I know of is a pure democracy unless possibly North Dakota should finally succeed in passing resolution No. 44, as I remember the number, under which it is proposed to abolish all constitutional limitations and become a pure democracy. In that event that will be the only State in the Union on the basis of a pure democracy. Even the most radical of the 48 States, where experiments in government are tried, has not gone to the limit as yet; but North Dakota threatens to do so under the lead of Mr. Townley. He would abolish the Constitution, if he had his way, and he himself would become the law of the land. It is a good deal like Jack Cade, as portrayed by the English dramatist. The first thing he proposed to do when he became the ruler was to hang all the lawyers; and the second thing he proposed to do was to abolish all the laws. He said, "Away with all the laws of the realm; my mouth shall be the Parliament of England." That is where Mr. Townley and his colaborers in North Dakota are tending. There is none elsewhere in the United States. The United States is a republic.

The difference between a republic and a pure democracy is that a pure democracy acts directly through the people and a republic acts through representatives, and limitations are imposed upon the powers of the agents representing the popular will. Those limitations ordinarily are in the form of constitutions. The old governor of Massachusetts Bay, Henry Vane, went back to England and lost his life as a sacrifice to the principle that there should be no limitation on the power of free government, so that the minority might not be oppressed or destroyed by the majority. He was sent to a dungeon by Oliver Cromwell, although Henry Vane himself was a great republican reformer of that day. He was the governor of the old Province of Massachusetts Bay, elected by the Puritans of that Colony. He afterwards went back to England and refused, in the days of Charles I, to support arbitrary power in the King. After Charles I was beheaded and Cromwell became dictator Vane refused to support absolute power in the hands of Cromwell and was put in the Tower. After Cromwell died and the restoration came, being under suspicion because he had been the supporter of republican government, Vane was taken out and beheaded by the followers of Charles II, then on the throne. So that he understood very well, and so did all his successors, the difference between a republican form of government and a pure democracy of the kind that Mr. Townley is trying to establish according to his code.

Population and votes ordinarily are the most potent of governmental force, but they are not all. They are to be first considered, but there are secondary matters that ought to be considered in the application of a limitation here on the right of debate. There are other things in a State besides people, although they are of primary importance and everything else is made subservient to their welfare.

Outside of territory, which I am not considering in this connection at all, I want to consider some of the material resources of the States. When it comes to the question of enacting revenue laws it becomes important to remember where a large part of the revenue is collected—not who spends it, but who pays it. I will only refer to that in a general way and will present no tabulations at this time.

The State of New York equals in its manufacturing resources 29 other States of the Union, according to the figures taken from the census report and footed up. Pennsylvania alone equals in its manufacturing resources 27 other States in the Union; Illinois equals 23 other States in the Union; and Massachusetts and Ohio each equals 20 and 19 other States in the Union, respectively. The relative values of the agricultural products of the States in the several groups show an overwhelming preponderance in the States whose Senators opposed the bill or went solidly against the administration in the 1914 election and some of them in 1916. Even the total cotton production coming from the 11 States referred to in the second group which I have mentioned—and I only refer to this to show that they are of the minority party—is about equaled in value by the hay crop of the United States, while the value of the corn crop of the country is double that of the cotton crop, for the export of which the shipping bill, for instance, was supposed to provide. That was one of the arguments used by the majority side of the Chamber whenever an argument was heard. The bank deposits of New York State are more than those of 33 other States combined; the deposits of Massachusetts equal those of 20 other States; and the bank deposits of Pennsylvania and Illinois each equal the deposits of 17 other States.

If the occupations followed by the people of the several States are considered, neither can the majority in the Senate fairly claim to represent the immense volume of business and productive transactions of the larger States, which are in a hopeless minority on a roll call of the Senate.

The filibuster therefore becomes an admittedly proper weapon of defense against the combinations of smaller States of lesser material resources. As it is here, taxation is imposed by the smaller States, the States of lesser resources, on the States possessing the larger resources of the country and paying practically three-fourths, in round figures, of the taxes collected.

I know that "filibuster" is an offensive epithet. It has been used in a very critical way many times, but we had just as well acknowledge that it has served some good purposes in its time. So long as Executive influence or the binding power of the caucus or conference remains, I believe the right of unlimited discussion here ought to be preserved for the purpose of neutralizing those malevolent influences.

I presume that this proposed new rule is designed in view of some emergency that is likely to arise. I find that most of the changes of existing conditions are builded upon some apprehended emergency. Just what it is I am unable to say. I do not know when a peace treaty may come before this body or the character of that treaty. It is possible that it may come sooner than is anticipated, and we hope that it may, but, for my part, now that we are in the war, I might just as well say that I want this war fought to such a conclusion that the generation on the stage after we are off will have permanent peace. I am feeling some of the burdens of this war and my neighbors are feeling them, and I would rejoice to see an honorable peace made possible by the ratification of this body, but I am not unmindful of the fact that the President himself is surrounded by many who at heart are pacifists, who are for the war simply because the Executive thought proper to come to Congress with a message and because later Congress declared war.

Many of such Executive advisers will be exceedingly unsafe to negotiate an honorable and permanent peace. A vast clamor will attend any peace treaty even if improvident and unwise. Mr. Creel and his publicity bureau would manufacture, within the limits of perverted power, public sentiment to overwhelm or awe Congress. With a parliamentary gag law in the Senate, what could be done to meet such a question? The Senate, under the open forum unlimited debate, could check final action until publicity could reach the great heart of the American population.

The bolshevist government has now or soon will have its diplomatic representatives in this capital asking recognition. Is it not a vital concern whether it be given? This socialistic caricature of popular government has liberated from Germany's east front an army to be thrown against our allies and ourselves in France. It has delayed the end of the war, multiplied our burdens, taken toll of our young lives, and added billions to our expenditures. It has set up impossible freaks as statesmen, indulged in bloody experiments, and turned back the progress of the war by many weary months or years. Before we extend our approval to such a bloody sarcasm on human government, I would myself prefer more than an hour in this Chamber for some of its Members to discuss the propriety of such recognition.

The United States Senate is the last refuge of free speech in this Republic. Creel's publicity bureau keeps its hand on the throat of the printing press. A swarm of petty Government officials and informers busily note every utterance, public or private, of individual speech. From phlegmatic apathy the administration has passed to persecuting hysteria. Its punishment is not criticized in proper cases. I rather criticize the mildness of its penalties on notorious and flagrant offenders.

With the Senate debate limited, the last stand for publicity is impossible. The Senate can as well be limited to 10 minutes' discussion as it can to 1 hour. It will apply with all its limitation to the discussion of treaties, to the confirmation of ambassadors, and our relation to governments existing or to be hereafter established in the mighty changes sweeping over the world. Why shall we close the last public forum of free speech in this Government at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, unless some other Senator desires to speak at this time, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think I shall have to object to a recess.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I had an understanding this morning with some Senators representing the other side of the Chamber that we could proceed in this way, as they wanted to be absent this afternoon. That understanding, however, was not with all of them, and, of course, not with the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had not heard of any such understanding. In fact, I have heard several protests against taking a recess, on the ground that it would eliminate all morning business on Monday. I do not see why we can not have an ordinary adjournment, which will permit the Senate to transact the regular morning business on Monday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course I recognize the fact that the Senator from New York can force an adjournment by an objection; but there are Senators who desired to be away this afternoon, it being Saturday afternoon, some being called out of town, and some for business reasons.

For that reason I agreed that we would not press the resolution to a vote this afternoon; and it was my understanding with them that there would be no objection to taking a recess and conserving two hours on Monday to make up for the time lost this afternoon. Of course I did not have the understanding with the Senator from New York; but I thought the Senators to whom I spoke represented that side of the Chamber, and therefore I agreed to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not like to presume too much——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not talk with the Senator from Alabama on this subject, but I was informed by another Senator that after the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] concluded his remarks there likely would be a recess until Monday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Alabama remembers that just before the Senator from Illinois commenced his remarks this afternoon the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] protested against taking a recess.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Connecticut protested against unanimous consent being given at that time for a recess, but not against its being brought about by a vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Alabama think that the Senator from Connecticut would have been perfectly willing to vote for a recess himself?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but I think he meant that if the Senate itself voted for a recess he had no objection. I do not know; I do not speak for the Senator.

Of course, I recognize that a recess requires a quorum, and I also recognize that a quorum is not in the Capitol at this time; but I make the motion, and if a quorum is demanded, of course I shall have to fall back on a motion to adjourn, although I hope the Senator from New York will not insist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not mean to seem overinsistent on this matter; but it seems to me that the consideration of this proposed rule is not of such enormous importance as to prevent the Senate from doing any other business, and if a recess were taken it would prevent the Senate from doing any of its regular routine business. There are many bills upon the calendar which could well be taken up before the hour of 2 o'clock on Monday. I therefore shall be compelled to suggest the absence of a quorum if the Senator from Alabama makes the motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is apparent that a quorum is not in the Capitol this afternoon, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 10, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 8, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We would praise and hallow Thy name, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, for all the religions of the world which tend to exalt and ennoble mankind; especially for the Christian religion, with its hallowed associations, its marvelous precepts, and the wonderful truths it reveals; for the Christian Sunday, preeminently the Lord's day, with its quiet and rest, its comfort for the weary and heavy laden; for the opportunity it affords the devout to worship Thee in spirit and in truth; for the inspiration it affords to all mankind in the resurrection of its Founder, which proves the power of life over death.

May the day strengthen us to meet the responsibilities of life and fulfill its duties faithfully and conscientiously, that we may indeed be disciples of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Speaker to the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 7237), which has appeared in the RECORD twice already. I am advised that the conference report, in its reference to the various amendments, refers to the House print of the bill with the Senate amendments. The conference report on any bill ought to refer to the House bill as engrossed with the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that Judge MOON, the chairman of that committee, is not here at this moment. He might be able to give some explanation of it. Now, if the gentleman wishes to go on, all right.

Mr. WALSH. I am willing to defer it; but, of course, the report will be subject to a point of order when it comes up.

The SPEAKER. If that is what the gentleman is driving at, then he had better defer it.

Mr. WALSH. My idea was to get it back to the conferees so that the clerk of the conference could redraft it in accordance with the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better wait until Judge MOON comes in. Under the special order the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has 30 minutes.

HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT TO-DAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to express to the gentleman in charge of the vocational rehabilitation bill [Mr. BANKHEAD]—as I understand that bill will follow the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]—the hope that the committee will rise about 3 o'clock, at which time I hope to make a motion to adjourn, so as to give the membership of the House an opportunity to help the Red Cross by attendance at the baseball game this afternoon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the pension bill which was passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the pension bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like further to say that when the vote was taken on that bill I was attending to a department call at the War Department. If I had been present, I would have voted "yea."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4404. An act repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907, (34 Stat. L., 1015-1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation in Montana; and

S. 4108. An act to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5558. An act to amend section 101 of the Judicial Code;

H. R. 9959. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912;

H. R. 7796. An act to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan; and

H. R. 9864. An act to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code.

THE NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE AND ITS CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has 30 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a recent movement in the Northwest, at first purely local and concerned with economic questions in which farmers were primarily interested, has, since this country entered the war, taken a new direction, extending its activities over several States, and, by reason of the character of its doctrines, requires the immediate attention of the authorities of the Nation. I refer to the Non-Partisan League, organized in North Dakota some two or three years ago.

On this occasion I shall confine myself largely to the activities of this organization in Minnesota and the situation there at the present hour. Those who organized this league were none of them farmers. They were a crowd of socialists, who succeeded in beguiling a large number of the farmers of North Dakota to follow their socialistic leadership. There can be no legal objection of any kind to a voluntary association by farmers to accomplish economic aims that look good to them. I wish it distinctly understood that a farmer has as good a right to organize for his economic betterment as any other citizen in the land. In fact, I think it is good for him to do so.

About the time the United States entered the war the leaders of the Non-Partisan League transferred their activities from North Dakota to Minnesota, and are now endeavoring to organize Minnesota and control the State. The men who have the direction of all affairs of the Non-Partisan League are socialists, and nothing but socialists. Some of them appear to be positively anarchists. As a consequence, from the beginning of these strenuous war days, the leaders of this league have given to the league a distinctly seditious direction, and the whole institution has come to be a sinister influence in our national life—a menace to all our war work. Many men have joined this league not knowing its seditious character; many have joined it who themselves have not been exactly lacking in patriotism. They have, however, at once found themselves among evil influences, and many of them have been led sadly astray. The rush to its membership comes from those of pro-German sympathies.

During recent months I have covered all sections of Minnesota delivering loyalty addresses to aid the liberty loan, Red Cross, and other war organizations. I have found the same thing everywhere. All pro-German elements in the State are either in the Non-Partisan League or affiliated with it. When a branch of the league is organized in a locality, the charter members are all the rabid pro-German members of the community. To-day it is safe to say that practically all the pro-Germans in the State are members of the league or are directly affiliated with it. The safety commission of the State and other governmental agencies have been active in their efforts to prevent the seditious activities of the league.

The State manager of the league for Minnesota is Joseph Gilbert. He has been indicted by the grand jury of Martin County for obstructing the military and naval policies of the United States. February 12 of this year he was convicted in Jackson County of the crime of unlawful assembly and sentenced. He has appealed. On May 10, 1918, he was convicted in Goodhue County of utterances tending to discourage enlistments. He has appealed from this conviction. Mr. A. C. Townley is national head of the Non-Partisan League. He has recently been indicted by the grand jury in Martin County, Minn., for obstructing military and naval policies of the United States. He was arrested February 12 in Jackson County for seditious work, and has recently been indicted by the grand jury of Jackson County, the demurrer to the indictment having just been argued. He was instrumental in having the State convention of his league adopt resolutions of which the following is a part, and has been responsible for its circulation throughout the State:

The contributory causes of the present war are various, but above the horrible slaughter loom the ugly incitings of an economic system based upon exploitation. It is largely the convulsive effort upon the part of adroit workers of warring nations for control of the constantly diminishing market. Rival groups of monopolists are playing a deadly game for commercial supremacy. * * * To conscript men and exempt the blood-stained wealth coined from the sufferings of humanity is repugnant to the spirit of America and contrary to the ideals of democracy.

An organizer of the Non-Partisan League, named F. J. Shumaker, was convicted in Blue Earth County on account of remarks he made in a local meeting of the Non-Partisan League. The State organizer is N. S. Randall. On May 3, 1918, he was convicted in Goodhue County of utterances tending to discourage enlistments. He appealed and is out on bail. Mr. George D. Brewer, a worker for the league, was convicted in Pipestone County recently of unlawful assembly and fined. Carl A. Wold, Douglas County, an active worker in the Non-Partisan League, and editor of a paper devoted to the interests of the league, was convicted in Douglas County and is out on appeal. Joseph Kolu, an organizer of the Non-Partisan League, was recently indicted by the grand jury in Crow Wing County for seditious utterances and is awaiting trial. F. A. Teigen, another organizer of the Non-Partisan League, was recently indicted by the Federal grand jury in Minneapolis for obstructing enlistments. I am mighty glad that the county which has given to this House three of its Members, Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. ANDERSON, and myself, has taken steps to throw these fellows out. He was working in McLeod County, which is almost solidly German. These are the men in exclusive direction of the affairs of the Non-Partisan League, and this is the kind of work of which they are guilty every hour.

Townley and his fellow seditionists are making a tremendous effort to get control of the State by electing one of their number governor. This is the important office. This is the one upon which their main effort is centered. Mr. Townley looked about to find a man exactly to his liking, one whose principles at this time accorded with his own. He soon found the man he wanted. Charles A. Lindbergh had just presented to the people of the State the principles upon which he stood and which he insisted should be put into operation. In July, 1917, he published these principles in a little book to serve as a sort of platform upon which he would go before the people of the State for political preferment. Evidently these principles are exactly to the liking of Mr. Townley and his associates, for Lindbergh was promptly picked as the man they would make governor. This leads us naturally to inquire into the character of these principles upon which Mr. Lindbergh stands and upon which he asks to be elected governor. The book is entitled "Why is Your Country at War?" and was published about the middle of July, 1917, many months after we had been at war. It is to be noted that he declines to honor this country by calling it "his" country. He does not say "my county," not even "our country," but "your country." Isolated fragments of a book can easily be misleading, but there is no question about this work. Running through it from end to end and on every page is the same state of mind, the same advocacy of doctrines, and the same expressions of thought, calculated to do deadly harm to this Nation in her hour of deep distress. In many places he informs us why this country is at war. Thus we find on page 80:

This—

Referring to the "big financiers"—

was the very same group that have been so active in these later years creating the conditions which caused the belligerents in the European war to violate some of our international rights, and it was they, primarily, who laid all the plans to bring about a condition to excite our people into a state of war fever. Their press was worked night and day at the game, to play upon patriotism, to excite it even by false statements—statements which, if they were true, would have justified extraordinary action long, long ago, on the part of the people to combat.

Again he says on page 115:

Several times their greed went so far as to nearly force us into the war on account of their selfish acts. From the very beginning the speculators sought in every way possible to work up a public sentiment that in itself should by them be converted into commercial profit, and even to the extent of bringing us into the war, if it should serve their ends best to have it done. When the big loans were made to some of the belligerents it was very clear that if the ultimate payment of those loans became endangered because of their defeat by the other belligerents, the Money Trust would seek to have us enter the war to collect their loans.

How vicious to pour such thoughts as these into the minds of those of our people whose loyalty to this country is questionable. This states the war was caused by selfish money interests who have brought on the awful conflict for sordid purposes. No more damnable doctrine than this ever fell from the lips of a man whose country's life was in danger. Again he throws out in several places a sinister suggestion that our big financiers and speculators, having loaned money to foreign governments, caused our country to enter the war, else their loans would have been lost through the failure of the allies. On page 124 we read:

Of course when the group of inner speculators framed up a plan to be done in order to make their claims good against the foreign nations they were dealing with, they did not have in mind the reform that is sure to take place. They did not realize that the war would expose their system to public condemnation. They knew that the European nations would all be bankrupt, and that, indirectly, they would need aid.

Then again, on page 126:

Suddenly Congress declared war, and of course during the war different rules govern. But before the war Congress had tied us to foreign nations by authorizing the credit of this country to be used to exploit foreign peoples as well as our own.

After throwing these two floods of poison into the souls of Americans, he deluges them with these words:

Of course, all who have examined into the conditions know that the foreign governments are bankrupt, and can never pay their debts. They may pay what they owe to our Government, but whether they will or not, if we were to be in the war under any condition, it was best to make the loans to them, since we had made them our allies.

After undermining the faith of Americans in their country and the rectitude of the cause upon which it has staked its very life, for which our millions are marching to battle, and to which our entire national wealth is dedicated, he bluntly and squarely states his proposition in language that will admit of no doubt.

Wealth saw to it that the conditions would be created that would make it practically impossible for us to keep out of the war if the world continued to follow the old practice, and it is these old practices that wealth insists on following. Wealth is so greedy that it had to build greater fortunes, even if it took the sacrifice of millions of lives and entailed suffering on more than nine-tenths of the world's population. What was its demand? It was the demand of wealth that we should prepare a great Navy and a great Army in order to enforce the existing political and economic system not only upon ourselves but upon all the world—present and future. It required that we should impress into the service of war every available man and woman at nominal pay for their time.

Again, he says:

Speaking of our own country: On the one hand we have the "war-for-profit group," which at this epoch of the so-called world's civilization is responsible for the conditions that lead to wars. It is this "war-for-profit group" that has counterfeited patriotism for commercial ends and counterfeited the flag for the same purpose—all in an attempt to perpetuate the selfish plans of that group.

While the mind is being poisoned with these words he suddenly hurled out the following:

It was indeed strange that we should have proclaimed to the world that we entered the war to establish a "world's democracy," when we ourselves have not for 50 years been a democracy except on election days.

In order that he may not be misunderstood, in order that the people may know exactly where he stands on this war proposition, he reaffirms his damnable proposition relative to the case of the war in these words, on page 86:

We did not begin the war. It was not originally our choice to go to war. We were dragged in because the "war-for-profit group" refused to sacrifice temporarily their speculations. If they had done so, they would have failed to add the several billions of profits which the war has netted to them. Rather than lose that profit they carried on a traffic which tempted the violation of the freedom of the seas as public highways by all of the belligerents.

For fear the reader may have temporarily forgotten that we are fighting in this war only to increase the profits of the rich and to protect the wealth massed by greedy speculators on page 116 he reminds us in these words:

From an economic point of consideration the speculators made us a party to the war from the very beginning, and they still believe that it is their war, and that the victory will be their victory. They are the ones who have mainly been put in the managements. If we had entered the war from their selfish standpoint, it would be most unjust, as well as certain to be disastrous, irrespective of who wins the war from a military standpoint.

And still again to make this emphatic and to give it the big place in the minds of all he says, on page 147:

We have been dragged into the war by the intrigue of the speculators. The people already understand that, and all that remains is for them to experience the terrible sacrifice and realize that if things had been done right in the first place it would have never happened, and further realize that it would have been easier and simpler to have done the right thing for the American people than it was to do the wrong thing.

Thus it is he accounted for our Nation being at war! These are the influences that brought on the war! These are the things for which our sons are dying! Not a decent thing among them! Not a single principle worth fighting for! Aye, every one that which we should fight to avoid! But Mr. Lindbergh is not content with announcing his principles as to the cause of the war. He has many profound beliefs in respect to the conduct of the war, no one of which is decent, all of which are sinister. Thus, on page 17 we read:

"Big business" washing the hands of their captains. In all issues of their big press and other publications you can read about what noble patriots (?) we have in the men who profit by the war, while it is the plain, toiling people who are really supporting the entire system, including the payment of the profits to the big fellows.

He perhaps rises to the height of his power and reveals clearly the character he would have us elect governor of Minnesota in the words he uses on page 25:

It has indeed been humiliating to the American people to see how the wealth grabbers, owners of the "big press," actually attempt by scurrilous editorials and especially prepared article to drive the people as if we were a lot of cattle to buy bonds, subscribe to the Red Cross, to register for conscription, and all the other things. The people will do their duty without being hectored in advance by the "big interest" press. What right, anyway, has the "big press" to heckle the people as if we really belonged to the wealth grabbers and were their chattel property?

According to Mr. Lindbergh nothing is right, everything is wrong. The war was caused by graft; it is being operated for graft. Thus, he says on page 22:

Take the war management, the financial end, who controls it? Not one of the plain toilers have anything important to say about it. Yet the expense of the war, as well as the men to fight it, falls mainly on them. But it is managed by the multimillionaire. Where do you suppose they got their millions to begin with? Not by being liberal with their employees and allowing them the proper measure of their earnings; no, sir; not that. Millionaires are not made in that way. Sharp and predatory practices—manipulation—make millionaires. Why then tempt these sharpers with the financial management of the war? Unless they have changed their nature and their practices both—the evidence is against it—we need not expect them to manage it free from speculation.

It would be, indeed, strange should a man who thus disbelieves everything our country stands for and can see no good in everything the American people hold dear fail to express his attitude of the selective draft. Mr. Lindbergh does not overlook this institution, not by any means. Apparently, in his opinion, this is one of the monstrous things of the age. On page 33 he says:

Strange, inconsistent, even lower than criminal is that practice of the Governments which take the lives and the liberties of their citizens to impress into war, when at the same time they pay a premium in the form of interest or otherwise for the property of the rich to be used in carrying on the war. No one with an ounce of brains, unless filled with injustice or a mere hireling, will defend such a practice, for when peace is restored the loans of the rich burden those who risked their lives and the families of those killed.

Imagine the effect of principles like this enunciated to people not clear on the facts of the war; perhaps not certain in wholehearted support of the war. Yes; enunciated by a man who has been a Member of Congress for many years and by one who aspires to be governor of a great State. The result is deadly. Mr. Lindbergh says it is a crime to send our boys to war by the selective draft while at the same time we pay interest on the money we borrow from the citizens of the land to run the war. Is it conceivable that a man who had ever had a symptom of patriotism could expound a doctrine like this? What is its purpose? Certainly not to aid the Nation in the time of war! Its only purpose can be to oppose the Nation in its life and death struggle. Naturally we will expect to find one holding these views quite stunned when he observes the centralization of power in the Chief Executive deemed wise by Congress and the people generally to secure supreme military efficiency. So we find him saying on page 42:

Nothing is more childish than to place too much responsibility on one man, no matter what his position. The press, and even the President, have criticized, properly so, the Kaiser's autocratic power. But the same press, as well as the President, not only demanded, but the President actually exercised as extensive autocratic power as any Old World ruler—the press, "standing by the President," only when the power exercised was in favor of the interests it represents—but woe be to it when not favorable to such interest.

But please note the sinister cut in these closing words, indicating that the powers conferred upon the President are being exercised in favor of special interests and money sharks.

Even the Red Cross, that institution of mercy, aiding and soothing the wounded and the suffering, and those upon whom the heavy hand of this awful war has fallen, even it is not sacred in Mr. Lindbergh's sight. On page 24 he says:

Then again came the Red Cross campaign for funds. We want our soldier boys who may be sent across the seas to fight in Europe to be cared for in the best way possible. The purpose is one of the most important. Here again the "big finance speculators" are the principal leaders. It is not probable that they have any design to cripple the work of the Red Cross or to filch from the $100,000,000 fund to which they have liberally contributed. What they want is to control the organization of the Red Cross, because it will be worth billions of dollars. They will have a powerful influence in the reorganization of Europe. Out of that reorganization the "big financiers" expect to make very many millions of dollars profit. Therefore it is easy to see why J. P. Morgan, through his chief partner, H. S. Davidson, is fitting up offices to be donated to the Red Cross for headquarters.

And, again, he says on page 25:

The Government itself, however, should have both financed and controlled the operations of the Red Cross, but this the "big financiers" opposed, and undoubtedly because of the desire to be independent in organizing the Red Cross for the advantage it hopes to get out of the organization in the reorganization of Europe.

According to Mr. Lindbergh, the Red Cross is an institution now under the control and direction of rapacious money sharks who are trying to use this heaven born and God-sent institution to plunder the helpless and the suffering and to filch more blood money from the toilers of the world when the war shall end.

Prepared as we have been by beholding these doctrines, we are not surprised that Mr. Lindbergh sticks his stiletto into the vitals of the liberty loan. On page 23 we read:

The first bond issue was called the "liberty loan bonds," a name that suits us all. Here again the finance speculators managed the sale.

But he really reaches the full expression of his views on the liberty loan on page 171, where he says:

The new liberty loan was offered in the same way and with the same idea, in the hope that the plain people would all get a little of the loan so that they would believe themselves to be interested in keeping up the system. The big interests would be willing to take every dollar of the liberty loan and several more such loans if they were sure the people would support them. By getting out in the very start a lot of the bonds in small amounts scattered amongst the plain people, they expect them all to fight for a support of the system, whereas it would be infinitely better for the people if they would pay as they go. But if they did that the big interests would be cut out of most of their speculation.

It seems incredible that any person allowed to be at large in the United States could entertain or express such a view as this. According to Mr. Lindbergh, the liberty loan is an institution devised by the money sharks for the purpose of getting a large number of common people to subscribe to the support of the Government in the hope if they invested their small savings in the Government they would contribute thereby to the support of the Government, thus making it easier for the money sharks to accomplish their foul purpose by devouring the people and their small wealth. It is stated here that the liberty loan caused opportunity for speculation to the money sharks. If this is not a direct blow against the heroic effort our Government is making to raise the funds to sustain this great war, then it is difficult to see how any words or conduct could be seditious. But Mr. Lindbergh is not content even with these expressions. On page 31 we read:

We were plunged into war with the monstrous Money Trust speculators saddled upon our backs; side by side with us they are enlisted in the fields of industry, in the military program, and elsewhere for the purpose of exploiting us in each.

It seems to be Mr. Lindbergh's thesis that the continuance of the war is in the interest of the money sharks. Thus he says on page 77:

But nothing will avail them in their adroit attempt to hide from the patriotic people the fact that at a time when the masses were being made poorer by war the old system immediately created a few billionaires and a new crop of millionaires.

And so, again, on page 133 he says:

War, we have demonstrated, is simply the result of following laws and practices that create uneconomic industry, diverting the human energies from the natural trade and commerce that should exist. It is the domination of the "privilege" that has been given to a few to make industrial slaves of the rest of us that has led us wrong.

But that passage in his book above all others dynamically charged with sedition and the one that perhaps most completely denies faith in his country and his countrymen is the following on page 37:

As things now are, the main thing aimed at by the wealth grabbers is to use us—to make of us mere machines to wear out in producing wealth for them. Our children are to be dragged into our useless places, and we dropped into mother earth—"ashes to ashes," "dust to dust," good-by.

If that is all we are for, then God bless the Kaiser, the late Czar, the kings, "big business," and all the "big boys" who caused the war. It will at least be interesting while it lasts. If we are made simply to wear out in their service, the harder and the more dangerous our occupation the sooner will our ashes be scattered to the earth and serve vegetable life better, to bud in beautiful foliage of the grasses, the trees, and the flowers.

This is the platform of the Non-Partisan League's candidate for governor. A vote for him must be viewed as an indorsement of that platform. Our country is engaged in a life-and-death struggle. This is the mightiest combat that ever called for the courage and wealth of nations. The sacred cause of humanity rests upon the strength of America's right arm. Every patriotic citizen is standing squarely for his country, exerting his influence and his effort to strengthen his country. No man whose influence is not of this kind is a patriot, and any person whose principles are those above set forth, whether he wills it or not, is an agent of the Kaiser. There are no two ways about it. There is no chance for a man to be half good and half bad. America demands full patriotism and full service from every citizen. No person who claims to be a patriotic citizen can afford to follow the leadership of men who are indicted for sedition, nor can they afford to vote for a man who asks to be elected on the platform Mr. Lindbergh has put forth. This is not a local matter. Mr. Townley claims to have forces operating in 11 different States, and he threatens to control those 11 States. Perhaps you noticed in the morning papers an item from Nebraska stating that the safety commission of that State had just demanded that the Non-partisan League cease its activities in that State at the present time, because its activities were those of treason. To-day he boasts of having 600 automobiles traveling through Minnesota alone securing members for his organization and campaigning for his candidate for governor. They have unlimited money at their command. Let no farmer be beguiled into political support of this program by reason of honeyed talk about an economic program. This Nation is at war. Every thought should be devoted to the war, every act to the successful prosecution of the war. United we will win; united we must be. Economic problems can well afford to be sidetracked until, working together, we have won the war. At the present time this organization, being directed, as it now is, exclusively by a small group of socialists, is a distinct menace to our Nation. Let every American citizen take notice and govern himself accordingly. [Applause.]

PENSIONS.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, immediately after the approval of the Journal yesterday, by unanimous consent the Smoot amendment to the pension bill was brought before the House and voted upon. At that hour the Senators and Members of the House from Iowa were having a conference with the Fuel Administrator, Dr. Garfield, with reference to the coal situation in Iowa. I was present at that conference. I am and have been heartily in favor of this amendment, as were the other members of the delegation. Had I been in the House I would have supported and voted for the Smoot amendment to the pension bill. [Applause.]

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes, with Mr. HELM in the chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, when we made the arrangement about going into the Committee of the Whole for the discussion of this bill no agreement was reached as to the limitation of time for general debate. It was thought between Judge TOWNER and myself and other members of the committee that it might be well enough, as a matter of policy, to let general debate run along at the pleasure of the committee. It has now become evident that there is a disposition to indulge in more general debate than the members of the committee had anticipated. It occurs to me that in the general debate that was indulged in on yesterday the members of the committee had at least a fair opportunity—those who were present and manifested an interest in the measure—to become acquainted with the general policy and features of this bill. I am going to make a request for unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be now closed; and, pending the submission of that request, I desire to make this further statement: Those of you who are familiar with the parliamentary situation next week know that unless we are able to conclude this bill to-day—and if we conclude it to-day we will have to do so by 3 o'clock—it is very probable that we will not be able to take up the further consideration of this bill, possibly, until the end of next week. I regard this as one of the most pressing humanitarian propositions that has been submitted for the consideration of this Congress. The casualty lists on foreign battle fields indicate that scores and hundreds of our young soldiers over there are being maimed. They are already coming back to this country to our improvised hospitals in large numbers, and in order to make the necessary arrangements for putting into effect the machinery of the rehabilitation provided by this bill the utmost expedition on the part of Congress is required in the enactment of this bill into law.

In view of the great emergency, and in view of the fact that all gentlemen must recognize the imperative necessity of taking care of the wounded soldiers, I appeal to the members of the committee to grant the unanimous-consent request that general debate be now closed. We will be liberal in the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, of course, I do not feel that I am in very good condition to make an objection, considering the fact that this side has occupied a large part of the time already consumed. However, I have requests from several different Members which would amount to an hour and a half altogether. I suppose it will be proper to say to those gentlemen that there will be liberal debate allowed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is my purpose. As I understood, there are only one or two distinct features of the bill not clearly understood in which there may be some effort to amend.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes that there is quite a difference of opinion in regard to at least two sections of the bill, and in order to have the views of the committee clearly expressed in regard to those sections it is necessary to provide liberal debate on those sections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I apprehend that there will be no disposition to oppose that.

Mr. TOWNER. In so far as I am concerned, representing the minority, I do not feel that I would be justified in raising any objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama after his statement that liberal debate will be allowed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, practically the second section of this bill must be rewritten.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not agree with the gentleman on that. There might possibly be one amendment.

Mr. MEEKER. That one amendment practically changes the section. It must be changed. I do not think anybody would be satisfied to let it go through as it now stands.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think we may be able to reach an agreement on that.

Mr. MEEKER. If the chairman is willing that there shall be such an understanding, I will not object, but if not I shall ask to be heard in general debate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Such an understanding as what?

Mr. MEEKER. That sufficient time for debate shall be allowed under the five-minute rule on the amendments.

Mr. JAMES. Reserving the right to object, I understand from the gentleman that if this bill is not finished to-day it will go over until the last part of next week.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Unless we can get a waiver on the privileged matters that are set for the early part of next week.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill under consideration be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understand from the gentleman from Alabama that there will be no effort to close debate under the five-minute rule if there is legitimate discussion of the amendments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Unless it is apparent that there is an intention to filibuster.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman understands that there are members of the committee who want time in general debate. The gentleman from Missouri is slated to speak for 15 minutes. He wants to discuss the measure in good faith, and all the discussion we have had so far has been in good faith. Every one recognizes the need of the passage of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What assurance does the gentleman wish me to give?

Mr. STAFFORD. That there will be no curtailment of legitimate debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have already given that assurance.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. To reserve the right to object. I can not see any reason in getting unanimous consent to close general debate and then giving unanimous consent for general debate to take place under the five-minute rule. The gentlemen have got the chairman into such a position that they can run on indefinitely under the five-minute rule, and he can not object to it. Members that are going to speak under the five-minute rule are those Members who have taken all the time under general debate, and I see no reason why those of us who are ready and willing to vote on the measure should have to sit here three or four hours to hear the same men speak over again.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to say——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The gentleman has no right to reserve the right to object until I am through.

Mr. MEEKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Now, I am through, and the gentleman can reserve his right to object.

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, I am perfectly aware that some gentlemen vote on bills that they do not know what the bills contain, but others interested in the bills wish to know what they contain. Now, if we are not going to have ample time under the five-minute rule, I shall object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not give any further assurance than I have given already.

Mr. MEEKER. I am willing to take the word of the chairman rather than the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I do not want the gentleman to take my word for anything. As far as voting on measures without knowing what they contain, I do not belong in that class of Members of the House that the gentleman refers to. There are some, however, who do not vote on anything, except those questions that affect their particular districts.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has specifically stated six different times that liberal debate would be allowed under the five-minute rule. What different assurance could he give under the rules of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. He might swear to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman a question. In the contingency that the bill should be completed to-day and a roll call should be necessary, does the gentleman expect to have one to-day?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would not insist upon that to-day. I do not believe there will be a vote cast against this bill, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall not demand a record vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that general debate upon the pending bill be now closed?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known as the vocational rehabilitation act. That the word "board," as hereinafter used in this act, shall mean the "Federal Board for Vocational Education." That the word "bureau," as hereinafter used in this act, shall mean the "Bureau of War-Risk Insurance."

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question or two. On examining the bill I fail to find any provision to the effect that those who serve and are honorably discharged from the service shall be given preference in the classified positions of the United States Government. Did the gentleman's committee give that subject consideration?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee did not give consideration to that subject in the preparation of the bill, but after the bill had passed the Senate, and before a meeting of the committee of the House, that question was submitted to the committee by a Member of the House on the proposition contained in a separate bill that he had introduced for that purpose. He asked whether it would be possible to secure a rule to put that on as an amendment to this bill, but the committee was of opinion that it would not be advisable under the circumstances at that stage of the proceedings to undertake to add any new features to the bill. I want to say, however, that my impression is, although I have not run down the statutes on the question, that there is an existing statute that covers that same question affecting all appointments under the civil-service regulations.

Mr. LONERGAN. Quoting from the thirty-fourth annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, I notice that section 1754 of the United States Revised Statutes provides that persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be referred for appointment to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of such offices. I assume that is existing law, and that that law will be operated in so far as discharged men from the military and naval service are concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was under the impression that there was a statute of that general nature. It seems to be unlimited in its terms, and it appears to me from a casual hearing of the statute, that it would apply unquestionably to those discharged from the military and naval service.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONERGAN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Upon that proposition, there is a difference of opinion among Members as to whether or not the legislation is sufficient that now exists. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has introduced a measure which is pending before the Committee on Civil Service Reform regarding that matter. As to whether or not it is necessary, it does not seem that the committee is satisfied as yet. However, I think I can assure the gentleman that there is a disposition on the part of the membership of the House upon both sides to see to it that legislation is enacted unless we come to the conclusion that it clearly is already in the statutes. A bill will be introduced to take care of that matter, if we conclude that it is necessary.

Mr. LONERGAN. I hope so, because I am very much in favor of it, and will offer an amendment to the pending bill, if I conclude that existing law does not cover the situation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree with the gentleman in that proposition. So am I in favor of it. It is my opinion, however, that it is already covered by the statute which the gentleman has read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under article 3 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, hereinafter referred to as "said act," and who, after his discharge, in the opinion of the board, is unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume his former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation, or having resumed or entered upon such occupation is unable to continue the same successfully, shall be furnished by the said board, where vocational rehabilitation is feasible, such course of vocational rehabilitation as the board shall prescribe and provide.

The board shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to furnish the persons included in this section suitable courses of vocational rehabilitation to be prescribed and provided by the board, and every person electing to follow such a course of vocational rehabilitation shall, while following the same, receive monthly compensation equal to the amount of his monthly pay for the last month of his active service, or equal to the amount to which he would be entitled under article 3 of said act, whichever amount is the greater. If such person was an enlisted man at the time of his discharge, for the period during which he is so afforded a course of rehabilitation, his family shall receive compulsory allotment and family allowance according to the terms of article 2 of said act in the same manner as if he were an enlisted man, and for the purpose of computing and paying compulsory allotment and family allowance his compensation shall be treated as his monthly pay: Provided, That if such person willfully fails or refuses to follow the prescribed course of vocational rehabilitation which he has elected to follow, in a manner satisfactory to the board, the said board in its discretion may certify to that effect to the bureau and the said bureau shall, during such period of failure or refusal, withhold any part or all of the monthly compensation due such person and not subject to compulsory allotment which the said board may have determined should be withheld: Provided, however, That no vocational teaching shall be carried on in any hospital until the medical authorities certify that the condition of the patient is such as to justify such teaching.

The military and naval family allowance appropriation provided for in section 18 of said act shall be available for the payment of the family allowances provided by this section; and the military and naval compensation appropriation provided for in section 19 of said act shall be available for the payment of the monthly compensation herein provided. No compensation under article 3 of said act shall be paid for the period during which any such person is furnished by said board a course of vocational rehabilitation except as is hereinbefore provided.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, after the word "entitled," insert the following: "an act to amend an act entitled."

In line 14, strike out the words "September second, nine," and insert in lieu thereof the words "October sixth, nineteen hundred and seventeen"; and on page 2, line 1, strike out the words "teen hundred and fourteen, as amended."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment simply is to make definite the reference. The bill which was passed and which is referred to in this paragraph as the paragraph stands is the original act which created the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. At that time, however, the bill only insured vessels of war. It was a very short act and there was no article 3 in the act at all. That act was amended in the Sixty-fourth Congress twice and by the Sixty-fifth Congress three different times and various repealing clauses have also been adopted. Now, as there is no article 3 to refer to it would be manifestly better for the sake of definiteness that it should refer to the particular act that we are desiring to amend, and that act is this act of October 6, 1917, which contains for the first time article 3. It is only for the purpose of making more definite the reference to that part of existing law which we desire to amend.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would not take up the time of the committee and delay this bill one moment if it were not for the fact that there seems to be a great deal of misunderstanding—judging from what various colleagues have said to me—in regard to the purpose of the act, and particularly in regard to the meaning of sections 2 and 3. Inasmuch as section 2 has just been read by the Clerk, it is perhaps a good time to make a brief explanation. The underlying purpose of this bill is to rehabilitate wounded and crippled soldiers, and the bill does not apply to anyone who is not entitled to compensation for injuries received in the service under the war-risk insurance act. Now, there are two classes of wounded men dealt with by this act. The first and most important class are those who because of injuries received in the service are unable to resume their former occupations or to pursue any gainful occupation, or who, after having tried to resume their former occupations, are unable successfully to continue therein. This class is covered by section 2. The other class consists of those who are able to resume their former occupations, and section 3 simply permits these men who are earning their living to take the courses prescribed by the Federal Board for Vocational Education without any charge for tuition.

Section 2, which is the most important section in the bill, provides that those wounded and crippled soldiers who are unable to resume their former occupations, if they so desire—and Canadian and European experience shows that 80 or 90 per cent of such soldiers do so desire—may take the vocational courses prescribed by the Federal Board for Vocational Education. The section further provides that while they are taking these courses—that is, while they are being vocationally rehabilitated—they will be entitled to draw either the pay which they were getting for the last month of their active service in the Army or Navy or the compensation provided for by the war-risk insurance act, whichever is the greater; and, further, that during the time they are being so rehabilitated compulsory allotments and allowances to their families shall be paid as if they were still in service. If they choose the monthly pay, then of course the allotment and allowance is prescribed in the war-risk insurance act. If, on the other hand, they choose the compensation because it is larger, then that compensation is treated under section 2 of this act just as if it was the monthly pay in determining the family allotment and allowance. Now, while there is no compulsion in regard to taking the course in the first instance——

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Let me finish this and then I will yield to the gentleman. As I started to say, while there is no provision in the first instance to compel a man to be vocationally rehabilitated, if after he has voluntarily entered upon this course of training and is under the control of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, in order to have some form of discipline it is provided that if he is not making good, if he is not attending to his studies and doing what he is capable of doing, then the Federal board can certify that fact to the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, and that bureau purely, as a disciplinary measure, may take away from that man the whole or any part of what he himself is getting, but it is not permitted to take away from the family the compulsory allotment and allowance accompanying it. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to a suggestion. Under article 3 of the war-risk insurance bill where a man is injured and is entitled to compensation, he is not compelled to allot any portion of that to members of his family. That is personal and that goes to him?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if he accepts this training and that compensation to which he would be entitled without regard to the vocational training is larger than his regular pay and he accepts that as his pay, then this law compels him to allot a certain portion of that compensation to members of his family by reason of the fact that he has taken the training. Why does the committee consider that they should compel him to allot a certain portion of it to his family by reason of taking the training any more than in section 3 of the war-risk insurance act, where he is entitled to compensation by reason of injury?

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say under the war-risk insurance bill the disability pay which is paid to this man, and nobody except those who are disabled can secure it, is compulsory to the family.

Mr. BARKLEY. He receives it himself from the Government by reason of his injury?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but unless he makes a voluntary assignment himself his wife can compel payment to her of one-half of the amount which he receives.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is where he declines to use it in support of his family?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. But in this case, although he may be willing to use all that is necessary and all that he and his wife may conclude is sufficient to support the family, if he accepts this vocational training, the law steps in and says how much of it he shall devote to the wife and children.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALLINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I have said about sections 2 and 3 I trust may clear up some misapprehension on the part of some Members of the House.

The importance of this proposed legislation in its general scope and purpose must be apparent to every Member of this House. In the first place, the rehabilitation provided for in this bill is due to the soldiers and sailors themselves. In former wars it was thought to be a sufficient provision for crippled soldiers and sailors when they came back from the war to grant them pensions and to allow them to become more or less objects of charity. If a man lost a limb or was suffering from some permanent injury so that he was unable to resume his former occupation, we thought that was his misfortune and that nothing could be done to make him a useful member of society. In this great war, however, in common with the other allied countries, we believe that we owe something further to the wounded soldier; that we owe it to him, so far as medical science and education can do it, to make him just as good a man as he was before in the way of earning his livelihood and becoming a useful and independent member of society. Not only that, but we owe it to the country, because this war is going to tax to the utmost not only the material resources of all the belligerent nations but it is going to tax to the utmost the man power of the Nation, as we are going to have a great many of these men incapacitated.

It has been estimated that the number will be 50,000, but I am afraid that before this war is over it may be 100,000 or even 200,000. If it should happen that 100,000 of these men come back unable to resume productive employment, that will mean, assuming that each man adds to the productive wealth of the country $2,000 a year, which is what the Agricultural Department estimates to be the case in agriculture—and, in my opinion, in manufacturing it is much larger—it would mean a value of $200,000,000 a year in the production of wealth that would be destroyed, unless these 100,000 men can be vocationally rehabilitated. Two hundred million dollars is 4 per cent on $5,000,000,000. In other words, if this act does what we expect that it will, it will mean in the next two or three years the conservation of possibly $5,000,000,000 of the capital wealth of the Nation. It is certainly worth doing, and it is something that ought to be done at once. These men are entitled to it for their own sake; they are entitled to it for the sake of the country for which they risked their lives, for which they suffered permanent injuries, and for whose prosperity and happiness they as well as we ourselves have so much at heart. [Applause.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TILLMAN: Page 2, line 9, after the word "provide," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Nothing in this bill shall be construed to prohibit said board from providing for the education and training of a limited number of indigent, maimed, and helpless soldiers of the present war in the following professions, to wit, law, medicine, the teaching profession, and the ministry."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to address myself at this time to the discussion of the point of order, but I want to talk about the merits of the amendment. I see no reason, Mr. Chairman, why there should be a discrimination against a young soldier who comes back from the front maimed and crippled and who may desire to be educated in one of the learned professions. I realize it would be a mistake to pay a large sum of money to educate a man in music or art or in a number of other things; but suppose the young soldier comes back with his eyes put out, and suppose that he had been in a theological seminary for six months when drafted and wants to continue his studies in the theological seminary; I certainly see no reason why a reasonable amount of money should not be expended in order to allow him to perfect himself in his studies in order to enter upon that profession. Or suppose a young soldier comes back with both of his arms off. He has had perhaps six months in a law school and is equipped by previous training to continue his studies. I think he should be allowed to continue. I see no reason why a soldier should be compelled to learn to set type or learn to perform in many duties of industrial and vocational labor, provided he is fitted for a profession and seeks to enter the same.

Now, this amendment is not offered for the purpose of helping the profession; it is offered for the purpose of helping the soldier. As a usual thing, those who enter medical and law schools, normal institutions, or theological seminaries are poor young men. They are unable to pay expenses and tuition. Frequently they work their way through. Suppose a young man comes from the University of Virginia, where he has been working for his board and other expenses, as often happens, taking the course in law. He is drafted. He has no money when he comes back. He has lost both of his arms, and yet there may be the talent in that young man for making a first-class lawyer.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will be glad to.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think now that as to the people he has mentioned, who are blind or who have lost both arms, that the compensation they get would amply care for them and that they could do better really by taking that compensation and finding their own law schools and medical schools?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think so.

Now, the truth is that in most of the agricultural colleges a man can get a literary education or a scientific education with comparatively little cost, but he can not go to Virginia or Harvard or Yale or to law or medical schools without paying a large amount of money in the way of tuition and other expenses. A technical education like this is expensive. General education is not. No young man who comes back maimed and crippled should be denied the wish of his heart to enter a learned profession.

It should be left to the discretion of this board to determine whether or not some bright lawyer, some promising minister, some young man who would be an ornament to the teaching profession, or some soldier who might become a distinguished and able physician should be allowed the benefit of this fund as others are. To be sure, the learned professions are crowded. There are many preachers who misunderstood what the Lord said when they thought they heard Him call them to preach. There are a great many lawyers who ought to be digging zinc instead of practicing law. There are many doctors who could wield a butcher's cleaver with more effective grace than a surgeon's scalpel, and there are many teachers who ought to be students; and yet you will find many a bright young soldier coming back from France who has an ambition to become a lawyer, a doctor, a teacher, or a minister, but who will be denied that privilege if my amendment be not adopted. He may be the son of a widow; very likely poor. Certainly it would be a hardship on him to say, "You must learn to be a hewer of wood, although you fought the fiendish Hun like a hero and are blind, armless, or shot to pieces; you can get no money from your Government to prepare yourself for the profession that has been the dream of your young life." It is unfair, discriminatory, and gravely unjust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. This is a very important question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNER. I would have no objection whatever if the matter were not subject to a point of order. If the Chair should decide that it is in order for consideration, I would be perfectly willing that there should be a further discussion of it; but it occurs to me that it is subject to a point of order, and if that is the case it would be idle to take up further time with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved.

Mr. TOWNER. I know it has been reserved for five minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be ready to discuss the point of order when I get to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, I say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman's line of argument impresses me favorably in many respects, but this question occurs to me: The gentleman is talking about educating men to be preachers. Under our theory of government the church and state are separate. Would he not run into difficulties there, educating some young men to be Catholics and others as Protestants, or some Congregational ministers and some Methodists or Baptists? Would we not get into trouble along that line, using public funds to educate preachers?

Mr. TILLMAN. There might be difficulty there. To avoid that objection, all that part of the amendment touching upon the education of ministry can be eliminated. But the old idea was that public funds should not be used for any kind of higher education. When Mr. Morrill first introduced his land-grant college bill it was vetoed by President Buchanan in 1858 on the ground that it was undesirable and of doubtful constitutionality. Yet in 1862 the same bill was reintroduced and passed, and Mr. Lincoln, who was a broader statesman, signed the bill, and it is one of the most gracious acts that has ever been put upon the statute books. I was out in the great Valhalla of the dead this morning, and I observed that the statues for Vermont are those of Ethan Allen and a person named Collamer. I wondered who Collamer was. I found out that he was a Postmaster General at one time. I regret very much that Justin S. Morrill's statue is not there in place of that of the man last mentioned. I would prefer to see his statue grace some splendid circle here in Washington rather than the bronze figures of some of the men on horseback with fewer accomplishments to their credit. It ought to be on the public grounds of every State capital in this Nation, because by reason of his land-grant college act millions of Americans have had or will have an opportunity to get an education that they could not have procured but for the legislation that he fathered.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Would not the same objection as that raised by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] in regard to the ministry be raised to the subject of medicine? There are just as many schools of medicine as there are of theology.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; let the soldier select his school. There would be no objection to that, certainly.

Mr. ROSE. Would it not be required that there should be a board made up of all kinds of avocations who would decide as to these matters?

Mr. TILLMAN. Let the soldier elect what kind of a doctor he will be—homeopath, allopath, osteopath, regular, or irregular.

Mr. ROSE. I am interested in the question whether he would follow the Presbyterian or the Baptist or the Methodist or the Catholic.

Mr. TILLMAN. I admit the strength of the objection made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] respecting the teaching of denominational theology, under the provisions of this bill, although I can see no objection to a man going to a theological institution that is not denominational. The soldier himself should have an option of selecting the particular school he would like to go to.

Now, Jefferson was broader in that respect than a great many other men who went before him. Jefferson's idea was, in establishing the University of Virginia, that religious denominations should even have the right to build, if they saw fit, on the campus of the University of Virginia, their churches and schools and teach their religious views as well as teach theology in general. But certainly no valid objection can be urged against permitting this board to have authority to select a limited number of ambitious young men who are indigent—guarded by the word "indigent"—unable to furnish themselves with funds with which to finish their course in medicine, in law, or in normal work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would be a great mistake to make this discrimination. The experiment should be tried. I understand that in England and in other countries that have been using this method of rehabilitating their soldiers they perhaps have not given them, so far, the advantage of technical training in the professions, but America is broader and richer than the older countries, and less inclined to discriminate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] is not germane to the provisions of this bill. The bill covers solely one subject of training. It is indicated not only in the title but it is reflected throughout the various sections of the bill, and that is vocational education of our wounded and injured soldiers. The gentleman's amendment seeks to extend the scope of the bill to a different subject entirely. Instead of providing merely vocational education, which has a well-defined meaning, it seeks to extend professional educational training to certain classes of our soldier boys.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that a profession is not a vocation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, a profession is a vocation. It may be an avocation. "Vocation" is used in apposition to "avocation." Avocation is the pursuit of a calling on occasions, not as a continuous occupation. Vocation is generic; it includes a special calling of any kind continuously followed for a livelihood, and includes a profession. But vocational education is not professional education, and vocational education has received a well-defined meaning in this House.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at present. When we passed the law of February 23, 1917—

> To provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure—

It was never contended for one minute that that act would authorize the expenditure of money by the States for professional education of any character whatsoever. While the dictionary may not give a definition of the term "vocational education," nevertheless in the educational world it has a well-defined meaning. The Committee on Education of this House is a recognized authority on matters of terminology pertaining to education, and representatives of that committee stated on the floor of the House yesterday that "vocational education" refers to that character of education that is opposite to professional training and that it relates to training in the arts and industries. There would be no purpose in the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas if it did not seek to widen the scope of the bill. I maintain that this bill is limited to one subject, that of vocational education, and you can not broaden it by including in it a distinct and separate character of training, namely, training for the professions.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for two questions?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. In the first place, does the gentleman contend that adding the letters "al" to the word "vocation" limits the scope of that term?

Mr. STAFFORD. "Vocational education," in the educational world and in the bills reported from the Committee on Education, has a well-defined meaning. That meaning was illustrated here yesterday by members of the Committee on Education. We know what it refers to. It refers to the educational training of these men for manual pursuits and not for professional pursuits. It is a term that has recently come into use in opposition to professional training, and therefore vocational education is not professional education. It is a well recognized and well defined class of training, in opposition to professional training.

You would not say that persons taking up work in the professional schools of the country were engaged in vocational education. When I interrupted the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] yesterday to ask him whether this would not provide for a national university, he said, "Why, in connection with our universities there are no schools provided for training in the manual trades," and rarely are there. It is true that there are engineering schools, but engineering is a profession; but there are no schools for training in carpentry, for the teaching of the blind to make brooms, for the teaching of injured persons to work in woodwork. That is manual as distinguished from mental.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield if the gentleman has a further question to propound.

Mr. WALSH. When I rose I asked the gentleman to yield for two questions. Now, under the gentleman's restrictions upon this term "vocational," if one of these 700,000 soldiers now in our Army who is unable to read and write, according to newspaper reports of statements made by a certain Member of this distinguished body, they could not take that soldier and teach him how to read and write, but they would have to teach him how to make harness or something like that. The gentleman says "vocational" includes manual pursuits. I notice in the list given yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] he includes singing. That is certainly not manual. Now, what I want to ask the gentleman is, would not his definition of the term "vocational" preclude this board from teaching any of the wounded soldiers who come back here how to read or write?

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think so. If it would be a means toward developing their education in a line that would make them better artisans, that would be a part of their vocational education.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that this amendment is germane, and the only question, as I understand it, is on the proposition as to whether or not it is germane to the bill under discussion. I read from the House Manual, at the bottom of page 343:

> The test in determining what is germane is this, whether or not the proposition is on a subject different from that under consideration.

That is the test that must be applied to determine this question as to whether or not this amendment is germane. I call the attention of the Chair to the language on page 2 of the proposed act. Leaving out the first line and after the word "act" the language says:

> Who after his discharge, in the opinion of the board, is unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume his former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation.

Now the term "occupation" is a very broad term. It applies to medicine and to law. Now, the public conception was very clearly stated yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who is a good lawyer, as to what is meant by vocational education. He gave the popular definition. There is a distinction between the popular and the judicially determined question of what vocational education is. The popular idea of vocational education, I know, is that which applies to agriculture and the industries; but this matter has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction and a respectable court. I have sent for Words and Phrases, which is an acknowledged authority, quoted by the Supreme Court of the United States and other eminent courts. They say there that it has been judicially determined, and they quote approvingly that "vocational education applies to the professions the same as it does to agriculture and industrial arts." I will get this authority before I conclude and submit it to the chairman. It was read yesterday by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WALSH. Of course the gentleman is aware, as I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is also aware, of the fact that this is not a measure providing for vocational education but vocational rehabilitation. If the gentleman's contention is correct, in order for anybody to come under the benefits of this bill they must, when they enter the military service, have been engaged in some pursuit which would not be professional. Of course that could not be the intent of the measure as framed by the committee. In other words, they did not intend to discriminate against men in the service when passing this measure for the benefit of those who are artisans to engage in manual pursuits before they went in. It is a rehabilitation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. The language is broad. If the party after his discharge "is unable to carry on a gainful occupation." Is not law a gainful occupation? Is not medicine a gainful occupation? The Chair is bound by the language of the bill in passing on this question, and I am reading from the bill. I am inclined to believe that under the terms of the bill the board would have the authority to so use this money, but I want to clear the matter up so that there will be no question, so it will not be left to construction, so the board would have the authority if it saw fit to send a limited number of young soldiers to college in order to prepare them for a gainful professional occupation.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman was not present, perhaps, yesterday when Judge WILSON, of Louisiana, referred to an adjudicated case?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I was, and I have referred to it.

Mr. BURNETT. That vocational referred to professions as well as mechanical occupations?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I have sent for the volume of Words and Phrases. I copied what it says, and here is the definition of the terms "occupation" and "vocational education":

> The word "occupation" is a generic term, and is that to which one's time and attention are habitually devoted. Vocational calling, trade, business, and a vocation is an employment, occupation, calling, trade, including professions as well as mechanical occupation.

That cites an adjudicated case; it is from Words and Phrases, a responsible authority, quoting from a respectable court. That is the law of the land. The dictionary sustains my position also, and I submit that these authorities are more convincing than the opinion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to give the gentleman an illustration and inquire whether he thinks the man I have in view is a professional man or a man engaged in a vocation. Take the editor of a country newspaper who writes the editorials and manipulates the Washington hand press. Is he a professional man engaged in a vocation?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not necessary to determine that. Of course, there is a borderland between the two terms which is vague and uncertain. It would be mere speculation to go into that, and I do not care to take the time to do it. But I know that the practice of law and the practice of medicine are gainful occupations. I know the term "gainful occupation" is used in the text. Certainly the amendment is germane.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to some of the observations made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in seeking to argue that this amendment is not germane. While the administration of this act is in the hands of the Federal Board of Vocational Education, the purpose of this act is the rehabilitation of men in the military and naval service of the United States during this great crisis. If the gentleman from Wisconsin's contention is correct, the only persons who could derive benefit from this measure would be those who when they entered the service were artisans or engaged in manual pursuits. If that is not the correct interpretation, then the only rehabilitation that could be offered any man in the service would be along the lines of perfecting them in manual pursuits.

The arguments made here by gentlemen most interested and apparently most familiar with the purposes of the act and the language of the act and of its application elsewhere is directly contrary to that. They give a list of the occupations that have been trained for in other countries. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] yesterday stated that our varied and complicated industrial life would run the list of vocations being trained for in Canada and Great Britain close up to the 400 mark. In that list in Canada we find medicine, surgery, milk inspection, music, naval architecture, pharmacy, telegraphy, singing, public-school teachers, veterinary surgeons, wireless telegraphy, and civil engineering.

It is apparent, Mr. Chairman, in the rehabilitation that is carried on in other countries these subjects are considered as within the vocational rehabilitation. It is apparent that the gentleman from Ohio is of the belief that in applying this very law we will run the list of vocations to which this rehabilitation will apply close up to 400.

To say that a man who is a blacksmith can be vocationally rehabilitated, where a man who might be a dentist could not be, seems to me to be placing a too narrow interpretation upon the word "vocational," because one is included within the other. You can not get away from it by saying that because a man's vocation is also included within a profession, he can not be vocationally rehabilitated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware of the phraseology of the Canadian law, which authorizes professional training as well as vocational training?

Mr. WALSH. I was not aware of that; but I notice, if that be the fact, that nevertheless the professions are included within the list of vocations as given by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. "Vocation" includes all kinds of employment, and a profession merely includes one class of people that falls under the general term.

Mr. WALSH. That is my understanding, that the term "vocation" includes them all, and I submit that it is unfair to discriminate against one's vocation simply because it may be known as a profession. It is none the less a vocation.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not contend for a moment that there is not a distinction between vocational education or training and professional education or training?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no.

Mr. McKENZIE. If that were true, then all of our time heretofore spent in passing laws to provide for vocational training of men has been wasted.

Mr. WALSH. We have not passed any law for vocational training, but we have passed a law for vocational education.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not true that if a dentist, who falls within one of the professions, goes into the Army and becomes blinded by the loss of both of his eyes, under this law he could be rehabilitated and trained in some way so that he could follow some useful occupation other than the profession in which he was engaged at the time he enlisted?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not that the purpose of it?

Mr. WALSH. But suppose the dentist was not blinded and that he simply lost a foot.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if the dentist simply lost a foot, he would not need to be cared for in this class at all, because it would not interfere with the practice of his profession.

Mr. WALSH. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CARAWAY. Suppose the dentist loses his hand and he can not follow his occupation as a dentist, would you deny him the right to be educated along some other line?

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill provides for that case.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is the very point that I am trying to bring out, that the purpose of the bill is to give a man some other training.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it not the purpose of the bill to give him the training that he could be most useful in following?

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, replying to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, I have no doubt that if the dentist was blind—and it ought to be so at least—that even under the provisions of this bill he might be vocationally rehabilitated so that he could carry on the practice of his profession, even though blinded, but the point that I am seeking to make is that the term "vocational" simply because you add the letters "al" to the word "vocation" does not restrict it, and simply because it includes within it certain provisions that you can not exclude them and set them up and say that if you want to take care of them you have got to pass a measure for the professional rehabilitation of those men, that the purposes of the act are such as to hold open for all the men in our military service the benefits of the law, whether they have a profession or a trade or whether they are expert in certain lines, in case through the fortunes of war they lose an arm or a leg or their efficiency has been destroyed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, in order not to complicate this amendment and to strengthen it, I ask unanimous consent to strike out all that part of the amendment which pertains to ministerial education.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out all that pertains to ministerial education. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "provide," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Nothing in this bill shall be construed as prohibiting said board from providing for the education and training of a limited number of indigent maimed and helpless soldiers of the present war in the following professions, to wit, law, medicine, and the teaching profession."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The word "bill" should be stricken out and the word "act" should be inserted, I think, to perfect the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I accept the amendment and ask that it be so further modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so further modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I notice the amendment uses the word "indigent." The bill does not apply to indigent soldiers.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know, and this strengthens the amendment. The board would not be authorized then to send any man to an expensive institution which gives a technical training, and pay large sums of money unless he was unable to get the money elsewhere, and I think the word "indigent" should remain.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that the Chair will sustain the point of order, and I only rise lest some reader of the RECORD in the future may think the gentleman from Massachusetts was talking seriously rather than in a purely facetious vein. Of course, it is very clear to anyone who has read this bill that it relates to vocational rehabilitation and training, and the word "vocational" as used in this legislation has a clear, well-defined, and well-understood meaning. Vocational education, vocational training, rather, was discussed at the time the board was created which is to have charge of this work. It has been discussed many times, and no one up to this good hour has ever suggested that vocational training was intended to include general education or training in the professions. I am of the opinion that it might be well some time, possibly might have been well in connection with this bill, to provide for the professional training and education of a limited number of those men. I am kindly disposed to that thought, but the question before us is as to whether or no the amendment proposed is in order. Clearly it is not. We set about the task of providing for the vocational rehabilitation of soldiers. Now, I am one of those who have thought the time may come when the public may properly engage in the vocational rehabilitation of those injured in the industries, but an amendment proposing to do that would clearly not be in order on this bill, because it is necessary to follow the line and legislate on the subject matter that the committee had in mind when it took the bill up and on which it has clearly and definitely legislated.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman suggested he would be in favor of a limited number. Does not the gentleman think the language of the amendment rather limits its scope, because it provides that only indigent soldiers and sailors can get the benefit of this amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I think there are objections that could be made to the form of the amendment itself, but I am not speaking of the form of the amendment; I am speaking of its substance and clearly that sort of an amendment providing for professional training, without regard to how proper or wise it might be at some time to have that sort of thing, clearly is not in order on a bill proposing to do a certain definite, specific, well-understood thing, the facetious remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because I do not think they could have been seriously intended, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no escaping the logic of this situation. If under the terms of this bill professional training is included, then this amendment has no place. If it is not included under the terms of the bill, then it introduces a new element and is therefore subject to objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas provides for the training of indigent lawyers, doctors, and so forth, and in that way it would differ from the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes; certainly. For that reason it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is no escaping the proposition that this point of order must be sustained; that clearly the point of order must be sustained under the present form of the amendment. It is manifest to the Chair that the terms of this bill apply to soldiers and to sailors. It would be subject to a point of order for anybody to insert the word "indigent" before "soldiers and sailors" under the terms of this bill. This bill is a general bill; therefore logically the same rule would apply in this case to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. In other words, we have before us now a new proposition, that we shall consider a different class of people and that we shall consider this class of people upon an entirely different basis. It occurs to me that ought to end the question if there is any question in the mind of the Chair. I want to say this much further regarding the definition of the phrase "vocational education." "Vocational education," "vocational training," "vocational rehabilitation" have a very well-defined meaning in the United States. There can be no question about that. Of course, when we speak about a man's vocation it may include the practice of the law or the practice of medicine. Of course, when we speak about a man's education it may include the practice of law or the practice of medicine, but when we speak about vocational education in this country it has a decided legal and well-settled significance, and that must be something separate and apart and antagonistic to the idea of professional education. No one would claim that the use of language as has been well adopted in the legislatures of the States, in the Legislature of the United States, in the references of the courts—no one would claim that vocational education would include professional education, and yet that is what is done here. We are not discussing the advisability of it; we are simply discussing the flat proposition, whether or not this amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, recognizes the merits of the contention on both sides of the proposition and is unable to draw a clear, clean-cut distinction between the term "occupation," "vocation," and "avocation." They are terms, generally speaking, used interchangeably. The only guide that the Chair has in reaching a conclusion on this proposition is the context of the bill. It occurs to the Chair that the purpose of the bill is for the rehabilitation of those who are engaged in industrial occupations, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order. It occurs to the Chair that if the contention of the proponents of the amendment are correct and are well taken they are not prejudiced by the ruling of the Chair, and for that reason the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "vocational," on page 2, in lines 7 and 8, where it appears before the word "rehabilitation" in those two lines, and then the result will be the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "vocational" where they occur in both lines.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed directs the board to provide for the rehabilitation and reeducation of soldiers and sailors without reference to occupation. If the word "vocation" is stricken out, the board has the power to provide for the reeducation and rehabilitation of all classes of soldiers and sailors who may have incurred their disability in the line of duty. It seems to me a great Nation such as this certainly displays very little judgment and humanity when, to save a few dollars, it says to young men who have surrendered their opportunity to prepare themselves for a profession or calling, who have given up their ambitions to go as soldiers or sailors to defend the liberties of the people, and have been so unfortunate either by reason of wounds or disease incurred in line of duty that they are no longer able to prepare themselves for the profession or calling or occupation they had intended to follow, that "notwithstanding you surrendered your opportunity, you laid aside your ambition, and as a young man offered your life that liberty might live and that we might be secure in our rights as transmitted to us by our fathers, we deny you now the opportunity to fit yourself for that profession or calling you had intended to make your life work."

I am sure no man can wish to permit those who have stayed at home and have piled up mountains of wealth to escape taxation to the extent that our wounded soldiers and sailors may be denied this opportunity, or believes the people themselves begrudge this expense. If so, he woefully misjudges the American people. [Applause.]

Some of the ablest men professionally that this country has had, since I can remember, were men who as soldiers followed the fortunes of their respective sections of this country in the late Civil War. One of the greatest lawyers New York State has had, as a barefoot boy from my State, rode with that wizard of the saddle, Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest, and came home afoot, without a penny's worth of property, educated himself, and became a great lawyer. Dr. Wise, who possibly was the leader of surgery in this country, was also a soldier boy. Others, many others—lawyers, doctors, preachers, editors—suffered from lack of opportunity during that war who afterwards succeeded, but were greatly handicapped.

As to these young men who now offer their lives and are so fortunate as to escape even maimed and incapacitated to earn money, unable to acquire the education necessary to fit them for their chosen profession, are we going to deny them again the opportunity? Will we offer them the opportunity only to become plumbers or blacksmiths or farmers, but reserve to the slacker the professions? Is a young man to be denied an opportunity to choose his profession simply because he was more patriotic than some other and would not stay home to take advantage of his opportunity for education, but offered himself for his country, and comes home unable to prepare for a calling or profession unless this Government steps in and educates and rehabilitates him? Are we going to refuse to make a little sacrifice, we who stayed at home while he offered himself a complete sacrifice; deny him an opportunity merely to save dollars?

Strike out these words, and you create a board with power to pass upon the application of every young man who, as a soldier or sailor, has come back to us disabled, to determine whether he is able under its provisions to acquire an education and to be rehabilitated, and to follow that calling which he himself feels that he could be most useful and most happy in following. Not to do so, you close to him the door of hope.

I sincerely trust no one will vote to deny him this small recompense for the great sacrifice he has made. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] but a minute ago expressed his sympathy for the purposes to be reached by the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], but said that it could not be done under the provisions of this bill because of the rules. He will concede that if we strike out the word "vocational" we can reach that objection. He now can not say that he is unwilling to support the amendment because it has no standing under parliamentary law. The question is simply whether you are willing to help these boys who are so nobly helping their country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas have one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASTINGS. I made that request for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman that the word "vocational" is also found in line 14, page 2; in line 2, page 3; and in line 21, page 3. I think perhaps he would want to include them in his amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thank the gentleman. These are in the section that we are considering?

Mr. HASTINGS. In the same section.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent that wherever the word "vocational" appears it shall be considered as included in the amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. On line 12, on page 2; on line 14 on page 2; line 2, on page 3; and line 21, page 3; all in section 2.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the same section? You can not go beyond the section.

Mr. HASTINGS. They are all in the same section.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered shall be modified so as to include the word "vocational" wherever it appears in the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas modifies his amendment, and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY moves to amend the bill by striking out the word "vocational" wherever it appears in section 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Clerk designate where those words are?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I simply rose for the purpose of objecting to the unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARAWAY. I asked unanimous consent, and the Chair was putting that when the gentleman from Wyoming interrupted the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Without objection, the clerk will report the modification desired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY moves to modify his amendment by striking out the word "vocational" in lines 7, 8, 12, and 14, on page 2, and in lines 2 and 22, on page 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. And also in line 10, on page 3.

The CLERK read as follows:

Also in line 10 of page 3.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has made a very sympathetic and rather ingenious appeal on the proposition that he advocated and set out in his amendment. But I want to call the attention of the committee—and this brings it properly up for consideration—to one element that has entered into all of the negotiations and discussions that have been going on for the last four or five months, which I indicated in my opening address yesterday, between those officials of our Government who are deeply and intensely interested in the carrying out of this scheme. When the question of the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers was first discussed—a discussion inaugurated by the Council of National Defense—one of the first inquiries, of course, was what governmental agency was best equipped by virtue of its organization and by virtue of the functions which have been lodged in it by law to carry out the real purposes and aims of the bill that was to be proposed.

At first the Surgeon General's office was suggested. Then it was discovered that they were without authority of law to undertake the vocational rehabilitation of wounded soldiers. Other agencies were discussed and considered to determine which one of the Government agencies now in existence was best equipped by virtue of its authority of law, by virtue of its experience, by virtue of its organization and personnel, to undertake to carry out most effectively the purposes which were contemplated in this bill, and it was finally decided by all parties in interest that the Federal Board for Vocational Education, by reason of its exercising those powers and functions and having that experience, was the only board the Government had in existence to carry out the real purposes and aims of this legislation.

Now, the purpose of this bill, as conceived by its sponsors in the first instance, those who have been giving great thought and consideration to this vital problem, was that it should not apply to those who might seek to finish their education along professional lines——

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In a moment. It should not apply to the medical man, the lawyer, the man who wanted to take some technical course in education that would probably require three or four years to complete to any degree of efficiency or graduation. But the purpose of it was that it should be confined in its largest analysis to the activities provided in the original bill establishing the Board of Vocational Education, to wit, as set out in the bill, agricultural subjects, teachers of trades, home economics and industrial subjects, and allied arts and crafts.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: Are you in sympathy with the idea of confining it to these questions?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think, under the purposes and spirit of this bill as it has been framed and as it will be put into operation——

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not the question. Is the gentleman in sympathy with that construction?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say to my friend from Arkansas that I do not think it would be feasible and practical for the Government, under the present conditions with which we are confronted to undertake, by any agency which we now have established in this Government and the functions which we can put into practical and immediate operation, the education of a young man for three or four years' course in medicine, or law, or technical engineering, or anything of that sort.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the gentleman think that all these gainful occupations of that kind ought to be left for the sons of the rich, while the poor young men who go to the war and come back disabled shall only be taught to be diggers of ditches and things of that kind?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. I think there is an unfair implication conveyed in the gentleman's question, that I am particularly interested in taking care of the rich. The purposes and objects of this bill show that it is intended to take care of the poor—the men who have formerly been engaged in the skilled arts and crafts of this country. Certainly I would not deprive the son of a rich man of an opportunity who wanted to pursue a professional avocation, or the son of a poor man, either.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would the gentleman be in favor of a law that required that the man who started out as a blacksmith should continue to be a blacksmith all his life?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why, then, would not the gentleman allow the son of a blacksmith to enjoy the opportunity of acquiring some professional knowledge?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A man is not confined to his former occupation. If the son of a blacksmith——

Mr. CARAWAY. I understood the gentleman to say that if he had worked with his hands before, he should go back to that calling when he returned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I did not say that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I want to support the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for three minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not desire my friend from Arkansas or any member of this committee to rest under any misapprehension as to my position on this question, or as to the purpose and authority contained in the bill that we are considering, because it is not the purpose of the bill, as the gentleman will ascertain if he will read it, to confine a former blacksmith, after his rehabilitation, to blacksmith work. But, on the contrary, it is one of the primary objects of this bill to take a man who may have been in an occupation of that sort and by means of the machinery provided by this board, to educate him in some other line in which he might be more efficient and in which he might make a larger income.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it is the purpose of the bill to confine a man to some occupation where he will use his hands?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, why do you confine it to vocational training?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman will not allow me to answer his question before he interjects another into the debate.

Mr. TILLMAN. You would not want, then, to make a lawyer or a doctor out of a man, whether he is poor or not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not opposed to that on principle. I feel, as a matter of fact, that they should be given every stimulus and encouragement that the circumstances of the case will permit, but I say that under the conditions with which we are confronted in the preparation of this bill, and for the purpose of putting it into immediate and effective operation, there are no governmental agencies now in existence, and none will be provided by this amendment by the mere striking out of the word "vocational," by which that happy result could be accomplished.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the gentleman is not in favor of providing any instrumentality by which a blacksmith's son can become a lawyer?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not propose to answer that question categorically in the negative.

Mr. TILLMAN. By this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not think that is the natural interpretation of the term "vocational education." If the gentleman's construction of "vocational education" is correct, then it applies.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Chair has ruled that I am wrong on that. Then, I understand the gentleman is not in favor of applying this bill to educating a man in any of the learned professions, no matter how poor or worthy or deserving he may be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was not the purpose of the bill as it was framed, or as it is proposed to put it into operation by the governmental agencies which have instituted this matter and propose to put it into effect.

Mr. TILLMAN. And you are not willing to allow that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think that would be practicable under the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will my friend yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to conclude my statement. The gentleman seems to be impetuous about asking questions.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman does not want to answer questions, I do not care to ask them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope my friend will not be sensitive about that remark. I do not want him to take it in that way.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not sensitive about it. I just do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was attempting to make, if possible, a coherent statement of the objections upon the part of the committee to the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman. If we strike out "vocational" as he wants to do, it strikes at the very heart and purpose of the whole scheme of this bill as it is framed. For instance, the title of the bill itself, the very heart and head of it, so to speak, is:

An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

In view of all these facts, in view of the plan that has been agreed upon and of the purposes which we are seeking to put into effect, I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. In the first place, this amendment will leave this board free to rehabilitate these soldiers in any way that they may see fit. I think they ought to have that freedom.

When I first went into the hospital at Ruehampton, England, last winter, the first thing that Col. MacLeod, who had charge of that hospital, did was to take us into the room where the records were kept. He showed us that when these maimed and wounded soldiers were brought in there only 40 per cent of them were able to tell what they wanted to do, what they wanted to learn, what they wanted to become. He said the records showed that about 30 per cent were able to choose some particular kind of work that they wanted to learn in this school, and that the other 30 per cent who came there simply drifted and finally went out without having obtained any real value from their stay there. When asked why the other 30 per cent were unable to select some kind of training, he said they could be divided into two classes: First, the class who did not want to do vocational work, and second, those who were so shiftless that they did not want to do anything at all.

If the House will indulge me for a moment, I would like to discuss certain features of the work in these hospitals or training schools. The most pathetic thing to be seen in the rehabilitation of these men is to be seen in the schools where they rehabilitate the shell-shocked men. I shall never forget the sight I witnessed the day I went into the gymnasium of the great military orthopedic hospital at Shepherd's Bush, in charge of Dr. Hill. Dr. Hill was then a major, who had been in the army and had a very perfectly organized hospital. When we went into the gymnasium of this hospital there was a man trying to walk along a strip of carpet about 4 inches wide and 20 feet long. He was moving his feet from 1 to 2 inches at a time. When he reached the end of the carpet, the doctor told him to turn around. Without raising his eyes from the floor, he moved his feet very slowly and gradually turned around. The doctor said, "Now, see if you can't move your feet just a little farther at each step," and he tried to walk back in that laborious manner. They had been working with that man for nearly three weeks. To all appearances the man was not wounded in any way. He had not been struck by any fragment of shell or bullet. His nerves had simply been broken, and his brain no longer connected with his muscles. We were informed that in many cases these men who were rehabilitated in these hospitals were unable to do the things they had done before, and had to do entirely new things. They have to be treated sometimes by electric machinery and their nerves awakened. For this work they use women who have been specially trained in this treatment.

For these reasons it seems to me that this board ought not to be confined in their rehabilitation methods merely to vocational trades, but that they ought to be allowed every possible leeway to train these men to do anything that they can be trained to do, in order that they may again become useful citizens. While visiting these training hospitals we were informed again and again that two-thirds of the success of the rehabilitation of these men was psychological—that the first thing you had to do with a man who was brought into the hospital to train him was to get him to think that he could do something useful. We were shown men who had no legs who had been taught to walk. One man, particularly, by the name of William Houston especially attracted our attention. The colonel showed him to us as an example of what could be done. He brought him out and said to him, "Houston, here is a crowd of American Congressmen. I want you to walk down through this shop and see if they can tell which of your legs is wooden."

They were making wooden legs in that shop. He walked down and back. He bent his legs so naturally that some of us thought his right leg was wooden and some thought the left leg was wooden, and I think one Member said he did not think either leg was wooden but that the man simply had a stiff leg. The colonel said, "Now show them"; and he pulled up his trousers legs and showed us—they were both wooden. One leg was off above the knee and the other was off below the knee. He lost them in the battle at Hill 60. When he came there he was so discouraged because of his helplessness that he absolutely refused to try to learn to walk. He said, "Colonel, I can not do this. It is absolutely useless to try. I never can learn to walk. I have not either leg." He was so despondent that for 10 days they kept a guard over him for fear he might kill himself. Yet when we were there he was making a sum that in American money would amount to $26 a week. He rode a bicycle every morning two miles to his place of work, and was an expert maker of wooden legs. That is only one illustration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DILL. I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. DILL. The most striking thing about this work is the ability of these men to concentrate all of their power in the learning of these trades. They keep a man in the training school 30 days, and in that time they teach him a trade. It is almost inconceivable. Col. MacLeod told us that when Mr. Barnes, the labor member of the British ministry, came there, and he showed him the machine-made tools that were made by a man after 30 days' training, Mr. Barnes said he did not think it possible for a man that was not a machinist to do it. The man had been a bricklayer. They teach them leather work, they teach them automobile work, and electrical work. There seems to be something about the condition of the men—the fact that they have been wounded and lost some parts of their body—which enables them to concentrate all their powers in the learning of a trade.

This hospital had been in operation two years, and during that time 6,000 men had been trained and sent out to make a living for themselves and their families. In the light of the great possibilities to rehabilitate these boys, after they have given themselves in this war, I think the bill should be amended so the board can teach them in any way they may desire. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am heartily in favor of this bill, but I do think that its scope should be widened. I believe that there ought to be a provision in the bill providing for the education and training of some of these men along professional lines. I think that a young man returned from this war with his arm shot off, or with the loss of a leg, or otherwise crippled, who feels that he is called to preach, ought to be aided by the Government in that work. I believe that this Government ought to have a board before which this young man could go and present his claim, or make application for entrance into a school so as to fit him for the ministry.

Why, Mr. Chairman, men will come out of this war after they have gone up against and conquered this brutal, barbarous army of Germany, fighting for the noblest principles that have ever warmed the hearts of man, fighting for Christian civilization, fighting for all that is dear in life—some of them will make such preachers as the world has never seen or heard before. I want the young men who have been through this war for liberty and humanity, and who feel that they are called to preach the gospel, to have the Government aid them in this high and holy work.

If there should come from among them a young man who feels that he wants to be a lawyer or a doctor or a chemist or a school-teacher, why not open to him the field that will fit him for that work? This bill ought not to be confined to a particular class or to a certain line of work. It ought to be open to our boys in every field of honest endeavor, because these men are entitled to the highest consideration and training.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. KING. I am in hearty accord with the gentleman, but take the case of William Houston, mentioned by the gentleman from Washington, what would be his status if he had received part of the legal education and desired to be trained by the Government? Could he get the training under this bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think that he could unless the bill is amended as suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas. I want to say this in conclusion, this is a good bill and ought to be passed. I do think, however, that it ought to have in it the provision that I have mentioned, because, gentlemen, there is nothing too good that we can do along this line for these brave men, and when they return let them seek service in the various fields. Let us make this provision, and when a man is wounded and he goes back to the hospital and reads of this action by Congress he will say, "My Government is going to see to it that I am properly cared for, not only see that I do not suffer physically, and that I will have something to eat and something to wear, but it is going to help me to equip myself for a profession if I desire it," and this I think, gentlemen, this Congress ought to do. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we all agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that there is nothing too good for the boys that will return maimed and disabled from the front, but we all realize that there are limitations to the things that can for the present be practically and well done. That was in the minds of the men who wisely drafted this legislation. They did not attempt to do so much as to risk making a complete failure of their entire scheme. They attempted to rehabilitate along certain lines—practical, useful, helpful lines. They propose the machinery through which that kind of rehabilitation can be accomplished, and they did not endanger their whole plan with the possibility of a complete breakdown by endeavoring to cover the whole field of human effort and activity.

The very eloquent address of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] might convince us all if his premises were sound, but they are not. His premise was that we are denying all opportunity save to those who may come under the provisions of the bill.

Do we deny opportunities to prepare for and enter the professions because we make no special provision for professional education under this bill? Not at all. Opportunities are boundless in this land of ours. These are not to be the only opportunities for these returned soldiers. If they were, in Heaven's name, helpful and useful as they are, how inadequate they would be. The young man whose education before he entered the service had sufficiently advanced along professional lines or along general lines as to enable him within a reasonable time to acquire a profession could acquire it in any section of this land of ours without the aid of the Federal Government.

Mr. HASTINGS. Could not everyone else do the same thing?

Mr. MONDELL. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why not?

Mr. MONDELL. Because men who come back handicapped for the trades, but who must make a livelihood, if at all, with the use of their hands and feet, would be absolutely helpless unless they were given the rehabilitation and training here proposed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is the gentleman opposed to the Government helping people acquire a professional education?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago that not only was I not opposed to that in toto, but that I was inclined to the belief that the plan we propose in this bill of vocational rehabilitation we might eventually properly extend to the rehabilitation of those injured in the industries. But this is not the time to attempt to cover all of the fields of human endeavor and all of the possible fields of Federal help. This is the time to do something practical and useful by following on the lines that have been marked out by the men who have made a study of this work abroad, who have there performed very useful work along certain lines, and who are suggesting that we take that work up for the benefit of our returning soldiers. It would be very easy, indeed, by striking out the words proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], to make this bill practically inoperative.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield in the time allotted me. So far as its effect on the efforts of those who planned this legislation is concerned, we might just about as well strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all convinced that the wording of the bill as it is now presented to us for consideration will bring about the condition that some gentlemen seem to fear. The bill provides for a Federal Board for Vocational Education, and its purpose is to fit those who by reason of injury are unable to carry on a gainful occupation to resume the several occupations they formerly had, or place them in some occupation by which they can gain a livelihood. The board referred to will be clothed with great power and will be composed of men who have made a study of vocational matters. Any man brought under the control of the board and who is found unable to continue in the occupation followed previous to the war will find that it is within the power of the board to select an occupation for him, and one which will likely prove remunerative. It is argued that the board is limited in its scope, and that by reason thereof the real purpose of the bill will not be reached. I can not agree with those who adopt such views, for its seems to me that the very language of the second section clears up all of the difficulties to which reference has been made. I favor all legislation of the kind provided for in this bill, and since it does not prohibit the teaching or training of boys who desire to enter any of the professions—theology, law, or medicine—we can safely intrust all such matters to the board provided for in the bill. So far as I am able to judge, there is no serious opposition to the passage of the bill, as it is in line with other measures calculated to benefit those who have offered their lives in defense of our country, all of which has been favorably considered. There appears to be a wide difference of opinion among some of the members of the committee to whom the bill was referred as to the real meaning and purpose of certain parts of the measure, but I anticipate the adoption of amendments which will clarify the situation and make all of its provisions satisfactory and workable. We owe something of this nature to the soldiers of the present war, and I have no doubt that, under the terms of the present bill, those who are placed under the care of the Federal Board for Vocational Education will receive such training as will fit them to enter some gainful occupation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have read this bill two or three times with a good deal of care, and I want to say for the committee that reported it that I believe it is the best first draft of a bill that I ever saw, in so far as the mechanical part of it is concerned and the provisions of the bill and what it is supposed to do. When we passed the war-risk insurance act in 1917 we provided in one section for training along this line. I trust that this House will not, as it has been on former occasions, be swept off its feet because of sentiment. We, of course, think kindly of and all love dearly all of the men who go forth to fight our battles for us, and we can not do too much for them; but we must stop somewhere. Some men might say that in giving men insurance you ought to give them a $5,000 paid-up life insurance policy, others would say $10,000, others $15,000, and some would say that there should be no limit, and that no premium should be charged, because the man had made the supreme sacrifice of offering his life for his country, and that therefore his country can not do too much for him. I believe the provisions of that bill are the fairest and most liberal ever passed. There are some things, however, that his country can not do for him. I think that it would be the greatest mistake this House could possibly make to adopt the pending amendment. My idea about this bill is that if you adopt the amendment pending and strike out the words that are sought to be stricken out of the bill you would go in the very teeth of the genius of this legislation and the idea it is intended to carry out. You might just as well say that you have taken these young men away from their chosen vocations, that you have taken them out of school and kept them in the Army of the United States for three or four years, and that, therefore, when they come back, whether they have been wounded or not, whether they have been shocked, you ought to give each and every one of them a finished education, no matter what his former position was. When we have offered the benefits of this bill to him he will be satisfied and grateful to this Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the way I look upon this. My opinion of this legislation and the legislation in other countries upon this subject has been that it is to rehabilitate—to prepare a man mechanically, as near as we can, to what he was before—and not go into all kinds of professions, not try to teach a man to be a doctor or a lawyer or a preacher, something that will take three or four or more years out of his life, and probably will not be according to the idea we are trying to put into this legislation. It is rehabilitation and reeducation, not to start out and teach professions of one kind and the other—to make him independent and self-sustaining, if possible. I think if Members of this House will read and study this bill carefully they will find that they can not do better than to follow the recommendations of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment, I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may have inserted in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer later on to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an amendment which he proposes to offer later on. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is it an amendment to the pending section?

Mr. LONERGAN. No; it is not, but I would like to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall have to object.

Mr. LONERGAN. I wish the gentleman would not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HELM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 4557 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, June 10, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting original papers relating to the pension of Henry Pickle, now of Easthampton, Hampshire County, Mass. (H. Doc. No. 1153), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and letter only ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 645), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. IGOE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3475) to prescribe the requisite form of proof of death under policies or contracts of insurance covering the lives of persons in or serving with or attached to the military forces of the United States, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 646), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8802) granting a pension to Sylvia Ferington, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ZIHLMAN: A bill (H. R. 12427) to amend section 4414, Revised Statutes of the United States, to classify and to provide salaries for clerks in the Steamboat-Inspection Service; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CARAWAY: A bill (H. R. 12428) for the relief of the claimants of certain unsurveyed lands in Mississippi County, Ark.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HUDDLESTON: A bill (H. R. 12429) to authorize the health officer of the District of Columbia to permit the disinterment of the bodies of Eliza Hill Bowles, and Bernice Worthen Bowles, and Bessie Vivian Bowles; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McLEMORE: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 46) for the appointment of Arthur MacDonald as statistician of Congress; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AYRES: A bill (H. R. 12430) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Anderson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 12431) granting a pension to Matilda J. Woolsey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD: A bill (H. R. 12432) for the refund of duties paid on materials destroyed by fire; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 12433) granting an increase of pension to James F. Scott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 12434) granting a pension to Amelia Erdman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12435) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Freeman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LOBECK: A bill (H. R. 12436) for the relief of Samuel Friedman; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RUBEY: A bill (H. R. 12437) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Cox; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma: Memorial of the Oklahoma City Chamber of Commerce indorsing a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America relative to the coordination of all the means of transportation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania: Petition praying for the repeal of the "zone postal law," signed by the following members of the Altrurian Circle: Mrs. McCord B. Moorhead, Mrs. L. H. Parker, Mrs. W. E. Marshall, M. Alice Griffin, Mrs. J. Y. Moorhead, Mrs. H. J. Wheeler, Mrs. Blanch A. Ricart, Mrs. J. B. Harrison, Mrs. F. W. Haskell, Mrs. C. E. Leet, Mrs. W. T. S. Lindsay, Mrs. Elmer Eades, and Mrs. J. M. Moorhead; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition from citizens of the city of Corry, Pa., in mass meeting, and signed by Mrs. F. C. Fields, Mrs. Tozer, and Mrs. W. L. Durham, praying for the adoption of a resolution to amend the Federal Constitution to prevent polygamy and polygamous cohabitation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ESCH: Resolution of the Wisconsin State Council of Defense, protesting against that portion of the war-revenue act which increases the postal rates on periodicals and urging its repeal; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, protesting against Senate bill 4426, guaranteeing bank deposits; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, memorial of the Vernon County (Wis.) Council of Defense, relative to granting the free use of the mails to councils of defense; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of Bratton C. Hardin, editor and owner of the Express, of Rochester, Tex., favoring the enforcement of the zone-postage rates of the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAMILTON of New York: Resolution adopted at a public meeting held in the city of Jamestown, N. Y., favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which will prohibit the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Chautauqua County and a resolution of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Niobe, N. Y., favoring the enactment of war-prohibition legislation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RAKER: Resolution adopted by the California Congress of Mothers, indorsing House bill 5407; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Miss Emma Masten and others, of Fairplay, Cal., protesting against the zone system and asking for its repeal; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TEMPLE: Resolution adopted at a public meeting held in Claysville, Pa., June 2, 1918, favoring the adoption of an antipolygamy amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WALDOW: Petition of James B. Stafford, deputy United States food administrator for Erie County, N. Y., favoring the coinage of a half-cent piece; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 10, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we remember at the beginning of this session of the Senate that the things which are worth while are spiritual; that the fate of government, the measure of the power of an army, the probabilities of success arise out of spiritual things. We pray Thee to breathe upon us this day and put us in harmony with the great vital forces that Thou art using in the world to establish peace and righteousness among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. SHEPPARD and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Hale	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family. I wish also to announce that my colleague [Mr. KIRBY] is detained on official business.

Mr. TRAMMELL. My colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is detained by illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is absent on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Women's Clubs of Laredo, Tex., and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from sundry citizens of Dallas, Tex., remonstrating against the delay of the Senate in the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Arizona Bankers' Association, of Prescott, Ariz., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to guarantee certain bank deposits, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of the City Council of Seattle, Wash., praying for the fixing of prices on wheat substitutes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Medical Association of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the establishment of an Army medical museum, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Second Middlesex Representative District Organization of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, and a petition of the Equal Suffrage League of Norfolk Center, Mass., praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Stephens, Ark., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry citizens of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of further prohibition legislation as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Christian Endeavor Union of the South Baptist Church, of Hartford, Conn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Loyal Order of Moose, No. 289, of Bridgeport, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Randall amendment prohibiting the manufacturing of beverages, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Middletown; of the American Red Cross of Deep River; of the Theosophical Society of Hartford; of the Christian Science Church of Willimantic; of the Christian Endeavor Union of Willimantic; of the deacon's board of the Calvary Baptist Church, of Willimantic; of sundry citizens of Union City; of the Teachers' League of New Haven; and of the Elizabeth Seton Guild of Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Connecticut, praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Firemen's Protective Association, of Hartford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of duty and pay of officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of New Britain, Conn., praying for centralized Federal authority to determine the highway policy of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Lieut. N. W. Bishop Camp, No. 3, United Spanish War Veterans, of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to disabled soldiers and sailors and to widows and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American War, the Chinese or Philippine insurrection, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Being a memorial from the legislature of a State, it has the right to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF ARIZONA, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Arizona, ss:

I, Sidney P. Osborn, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the within is a true and complete transcript of senate joint resolution No. 3, "Pledging all the resources of the State of Arizona to the vigorous prosecution of the war," all of which is shown by the original on file in this department.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal. Done at Phoenix, Ariz., the capital, this 1st day of June, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.] SIDNEY P. OSBORN,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint resolution 3, introduced by Senator Rutherford.

Whereas the most important task before the United States is to win the war; and

Whereas the war will not be won until the peaceful development of all free peoples is guaranteed by the strength of their own will: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Arizona (both houses concurring), That the State of Arizona pledges all its resources to the vigorous prosecution of the war until Prussian autocracy has been defeated; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the State to the President and to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Arizona.

Passed by the senate May 25, 1918, by the following vote: Eighteen ayes, no nays, none absent, one excused.

Passed by the house May 28, 1918, by the following vote: Thirty-one ayes, no nays, two absent, two excused.

D. H. CLARIDGE,
President of the Senate.
A. A. JOHNS,
Speaker of the House.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have received a letter this morning, which I ask unanimous consent may be printed in the RECORD without reading. If Senators would pay any attention to it, I should like to have Senators hear it read, but usually they are busy with other things, and I think printing in the RECORD will be sufficient. However, I wish to impress upon the Senate that it is a matter of vital importance.

Mr. SMOOT. From whom is the letter?

Mr. TILLMAN. From Franklin K. Lane.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To print in the RECORD a communication.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the paper?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TILLMAN. My friend from Arizona on my left, who has become the guardian of the Treasury, tells me that there is no paper on which to print anything. Therefore I ask that the letter be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The committee will be glad to give it attention, and if it is important, as the Senator thinks it is, it can be printed as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior which deals with the preparation of land in providing an opportunity for our soldiers returning from the war. It is a timely topic, and I ask that it may be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. What is it?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same as the letter presented by the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the same letter, and it will go to the Committee on Printing, without objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I should like to call attention to the letter I just offered and asked to have printed in the RECORD. Everyone says he has already received a copy. It does not relate to concrete ships at all, but is providing for soldiers after their return from the war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not objected to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know you have not objected, but I want to call the attention of Senators who have received a letter similar to the one which I asked to have printed in the RECORD. I hope they will read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter has gone to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the letter I submitted be referred to the Committee on Public Lands instead of to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken. One will go to the Committee on Printing and the other to the Committee on Public Lands.

EDWARD W. TERRY.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2788) for the relief of Edward W. Terry, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

HEARING BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably Senate resolution 260, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HARDWICK on the 7th instant as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the resolution reported by the Senator from Kansas, but I shall be compelled to ask for the regular order, in order that we may expedite the unfinished business.

Mr. THOMPSON. The resolution will not lead to any discussion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure of that, but if I were not to ask for the regular order now I would get myself in serious trouble. It can come up in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is a resolution which was introduced by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection in the world to it, except that I must call for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator if this is not the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the report of a committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a report of a committee, and if there is objection to its present consideration it goes to the calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is why I demanded the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes to the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4686) authorizing the Director of Aircraft Production to form a corporation, or corporations, to facilitate and expedite the production of aircraft, aircraft equipment, or materials therefor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4687) to amend further an act entitled "An act to authorize condemnation proceedings of lands for military purposes," approved July 2, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 4688) to provide allowances for mothers with children under 16 dependent upon them for support in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4689) granting a pension to Mary E. Turner (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment proposing to insure the secrecy of military dispatches, information, and correspondence, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DISTILLED SPIRITS FOR BEVERAGE PURPOSES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a few days ago I presented an amendment intended to be proposed by me to a certain bill (H. R. 11945) which came from the House. My amendment prohibited the use of fruit, vegetables, and foodstuffs in the manufacture of vinous and malt liquors. Since the amendment was introduced letters have been read into the RECORD from the President and Mr. Hoover that I construe to be practically an invitation to Congress to enact general war prohibition. So in lieu of the amendment I presented the other day I submit an amendment which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I would ask that it be printed in the RECORD, but as paper is very short I shall not make the request. I may say, Mr. President, that this amendment presents in a general way my own ideas as to what ought to be done and not the formulated views of any temperance organization.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 5, after "$6,100,000," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following:

Provided, That from and after the date of the approval of this act and during the continuance of the present war it shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or transport distilled spirits for beverage purposes, and no distilled spirits held in bond at the date of the approval of this act shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes, and from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no food, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall, during the continuance of the present war, be used in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes; and the President is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe any and all rules and regulations deemed necessary to carry the foregoing provisions into effect, and anyone who willfully violates any of the foregoing provisions, or any rule or regulation made to carry the same into effect, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue and all other officers of the United States shall have all the power for the enforcement of the foregoing provisions which is conferred by law for the enforcement of the existing laws relating to the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors under the revenue laws of the United States or otherwise.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, it was

Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers accompanying the bill (S. 1182, 65th Cong., 1st sess.) granting a pension to Charles B. Syphert, no adverse report having been made thereon.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers accompanying the bill (S. 1172, 65th Cong., 1st sess.) granting an increase of pension to John Zellers, no adverse report having been made thereon.

GERMAN MILITARY POWER IN RUSSIA.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 262), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the people of Russia, after centuries of political servitude, are finally about to realize their aspirations for liberty and the constitution of a federal republic; and

Whereas the innate sense of justice, desire for public order, and the community life of the Russian people promise a sound moral basis for the institutions of liberty and the equal rights of men under the law as incorporated in a republican form of government; and

Whereas it is the traditional policy and the interest of the United States of America to promote and protect the progress of liberty and the principles of democracy as incorporated in republican institutions; and

Whereas the people and the Government of the United States hailed with great and sincere good will the prospects for the establishment of these principles in the great domains of Russia for the permanent welfare, political dignity, and beneficence of the Russian people; and

Whereas the Imperial Government of Germany, by intrigues and propaganda, and in perfidious violation of the pretended peace with Russia, designs to destroy the Government of Russia and the unity and nationality of the Russian people, and for this purpose is attempting to separate Russia into small vassal states in order to more effectually bring the people, territory, and resources of Russia within the German power; and

Whereas, in the pursuit of this perfidious purpose, Germany is now subjecting Russia to industrial and economic servitude and is attempting to recruit troops from among the people of Russia to replenish her depleted armies and to promote her felonious purpose in the world; and

Whereas the Russian people desire to establish a republican form of government and are in sympathy with the cause of the United States of America and of the allies, and would welcome assistance in neutralizing German intrigue and propaganda and in repelling the intrusion of German power; and

Whereas German troops are now operating in Russia and are making advances with a view to taking possession of Russian territory, including Siberia, and subjecting the same to political domination and industrial servitude; and

Whereas the cause of the allies and the principles for which they wage war are thus placed in jeopardy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that a commission be sent to Russia to cooperate with the American ambassador and other representatives of our Government to overcome and neutralize German propaganda in Russia and to aid in Russia's economic, industrial, and political freedom; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that a military expedition be organized and sent by the United States of America in conjunction with its allies, including Japan and China, to cooperate with the armies of the Russian people to repel the advance of German arms and to expel from Russia German military power and establish therein the authority of the people and Government of Russia.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. WATSON. May I be allowed to present a petition?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That seems to be always in order.

Mr. WATSON. It is a petition in regard to woman suffrage, very short, signed by 10 leading citizens of Indianapolis. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the request?

Mr. WATSON. That it be printed in the RECORD without reading. It is very short.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From whom is the petition?

Mr. WATSON. From 10 of the leading citizens of Indianapolis.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

Mr. WATSON. Then I will read it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You will not in this hour. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WATSON. I will read it in some hour.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well; it can be read in some hour.

Mr. WATSON. I can find time to read it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask for the regular order.

DATA RELATIVE TO PROFITEERING AND THE REVENUE.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to call up a resolution, coming over from a previous day, which is on the table. It is Senate resolution 255. I do not think it will take any debate, because it is the same resolution, only addressed to another department of the Government, which was passed upon last Friday. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 255, submitted by Mr. BORAH on the 31st ultimo, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

"Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the Federal Trade Commission relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is this the introduction of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is regularly before the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On June 8, 1918:

S. 3799. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

On June 10, 1918:

S. 1544. An act to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 235.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 235 proposing to amend the rules of the Senate by providing for the limitation of debate.

MINERALS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it was my intention this morning at the close of the morning business to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 385, the same being the bill providing for metalliferous mining on Indian reservations. I have not directly said that this bill is a "war measure," but it must be obvious that it is. It certainly must address itself to the Senate that this is as nearly a war measure as any measure can be, as it proposes to provide for the extraction of metals that we require and which we can not otherwise easily obtain. I feel, however, that if the bill were laid before the Senate now the morning hour would be consumed and no vote would be reached; that two hours would be lost, just as one and one-half hours were lost on last Friday morning and a like period of time on Saturday morning. Hence I am not going to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, but I now give notice that at the appropriate time—I do not desire to displace the unfinished business—I shall crave and seek, and I think obtain, permission from the Presiding Officer to move that the metalliferous-mining bill be made the unfinished business.

There is no disposition on my part to hurry this legislation. It has waited for a couple of years; it has passed the House and been twice reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. A number of Senators have requested me to move that it be made the special order. The objection to making it a special order is that if it be not completed on the day for which it is made a special order it goes to the calendar of special orders, which is a sort of mausoleum from which measures there interred are never resurrected.

I should like now to ask the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], they being the leading opponents of this bill, if I may have their cooperation in the matter of making the bill the unfinished business after the present unfinished business shall have been disposed of?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe that instead of the Senator from Arizona pressing this bill for consideration every morning it would be better to make it the unfinished business after what is known as the Underwood resolution has been disposed of. I have no disposition to unduly delay the bill; I do not desire to filibuster upon it. I believe that the bill is wrong, but the Senator from Arizona thinks it is right. If we may have a good, fair discussion of the bill and then submit the question to the Senate, I shall be content.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Colorado. He has made a very fair statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not in any way attempt to delay the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and shall content myself simply by saying that, if we can get a fair hearing before the Senate and Senators can understand what this bill really means, I believe the bill will be defeated. I think in my opposition to the bill I am serving the people of Arizona and of the Western States generally in the best possible way that I can. I am sincere in my opposition to the measure; I think it bad legislation; I think if passed it would be pointed to in the future as a precedent, and that it would bring untold harm to the mining interests of the West.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Utah is entitled to his opinion, and he need not say that he is sincere in his opposition to the bill. He is a sincere man. Nobody has questioned his sincerity. I shall feel content if the bill be made the unfinished business so soon as the present unfinished business shall have been disposed of. With that understanding——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona does not mean to say that there is an understanding to that effect, does he? There may be some other matters that some of us might think of more importance than this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, if there be a matter more important than securing platinum, if there be a matter more important than securing manganese and other metals needed in the manufacture of ordnance, I will withdraw the request for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona must not understand me as saying that I know of any other bill that is more important than the one to which he refers; and yet we can not farm out the business of the Senate and agree that after one bill has passed the Senate another bill shall take its place. We can not do that.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct, but, if he will pardon me, I am not trying to commit the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the only point I was trying to make.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not trying to commit the Senate. I simply want to draw attention to the fact that this bill has twice been favorably reported by the Senate committee; that it has been pending a year and a half or more; that it has passed the House of Representatives, and that it ought to be, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has said, discussed on its merits, and either voted up or voted down. I have no pride of authorship, no pride of expression regarding the bill. I would gladly consent to any amendment that would really improve the bill.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 235, proposing a limitation of debate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, in the discussion of the question before the Senate I shall observe the rule sought to be invoked, and in this instance shall do the thing which others pray.

Mr. President, the present world-wide emergency calls for sober thought, a comprehensive understanding of national issues, and prudent action on the part of the Members of the legislative department of this Republic. "O, that grave speech would cumber our quick senses" and that substance, rather than the shadow of things, might lead us on. If I had the remotest idea that the adoption of this resolution would result in hasty or immature legislation, limit or curtail necessary debate, and prevent full discussion, I should oppose it with all the vigor of mind and fervor of soul of which I am capable.

In times like the present, I repeat, when the typhoon of war is sweeping over the unhappy world and the reason of man is twisted and toppled like frail structures in the wake of a "Kansas zephyr," everything possible should be done to encourage serious independent thought, calm deliberation, and exhaustive study of the questions that come up for legislative determination. We need also a little independent action as well as courageous and fearless thinking. We are all mindful of the fact that that which we shall do to-day will affect not only the present generation, but the consequences of our deeds here will be far-reaching, almost infinite in their influences upon the weal or woe of the generations yet unborn. The things we do and the questions we decide can be decided but once. The influences thus put into operation will go on and on like the waves upon the heaving bosom of the restless ocean until at last they wash the remotest shores of time. Therefore it behooves us to be circumspect and cautious.

Mr. President, the resolution presented by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which is now under consideration, does not, as I understand, seek to interfere with, prescribe, or in any way limit the scope of study, thought, and investigation by Senators, but it rather encourages investigation, stimulates thought, and promotes mature consideration of all public questions. It is my opinion that if this resolution shall be adopted Senators will prepare themselves better; they will supply their minds with pertinent material facts; they will assimilate and condense the information accumulated by them in order that their speeches may come within the time prescribed by this rule. They will not, "like the bells, waste the moment with their loudness," but confine themselves to pertinent issues and see to it that substance shall take the place of sound. This rule will put a stop to impertinent interruptions and superfluous questionings of a Senator, which always destroy the logical force of his argument and the symmetry of his discourse without adding anything to its cogency.

The Senator "who draweth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument" often becomes, in the estimation of his auditors and of his affectionate colleagues, a most respectable, sometimes delightful, but always a parliamentary nuisance. Put this rule in operation, and the thin, watery stream of unlimited debate, from which always emanates the obfuscating vapor of verbigeration, will give place to a pellucid current of deep thought, boiled down to the spissitude of intellectual and logical consistency. It will also economize time, save space in the RECORD, and, I might add, prevent nervous exhaustion both to the auditors and the orator. If a speaker, whether he be a Member of this honorable body or of any other body, would be pungent, pointed, and pertinent in his observations, he must necessarily be brief, for "it is with words as with sunbeams; the more they are condensed the deeper they burn."

I submit, Mr. President, that this resolution will not deny the Senate a single essential truth, but it will save time, avoid delays, and promote the business of Congress and the country. Now, I want to state emphatically, for I do not want anybody to misunderstand me, that I am not voting for this resolution as a war measure purely, nor am I taking orders to do that which I shall do, as has been suggested on this floor, from any extraneous or occult sources.

My vote on this resolution is but the expression of conclusions reached after years of serious thought on the subject, and observations taken since I became a Member of this body. I entertained the same views on the subject of limiting debate when I came to the Senate that I maintain to-day. Experience has only served to deepen my conviction of the correctness of my original views and the prudence of my present determination.

I believe, however, that the amendment offered by the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], extending the time to an hour and thirty minutes, would probably be preferable to one hour. While I desire to limit debate, I do not wish to go to extremes. As I have heretofore stated, I think it will be a distinct advantage to encourage Senators to distill, as it were, digest, arrange the facts, and mature their thoughts before they come to utter them upon this floor. There is much looseness in debate in this body, unimportant diversions, superfluous questionings, which we could well afford to get along without. An hour and thirty minutes ought to be sufficient for any Senator to say all that he knows upon any question which will be of advantage to his colleagues and the country. But if there are extraordinary cases where a Senator desires more time than one hour and a half, the Senate ought not to tie itself by a rule which will prevent the Senate from extending that privilege to a Senator.

The suggestion made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in regard to amending the proposed new rule so as to permit the majority of the Senate, rather than by unanimous consent, to extend the time of a Senator, is wise and provident. The Senate should always remain in easy control of its own deliberations; and I hope the Senator from Alabama will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and also agree to the suggestion made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi, if he will allow me to do so, that I have consulted the members of the Rules Committee who voted in favor of reporting the proposed new rule, and I find, after collaborating with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on the subject, that we are united in support of the changes proposed; that is, that the time be extended from an hour to an hour and a half, and that the Senate, without debate, may have the privilege of extending the time of any Senator if it so desires. I think, so far as I am concerned, I shall ask that the Senate agree to the proposed amendment of the resolution when the time comes, and I hope that all those who favor the resolution will support the amendment and take that as the final solution of the problem.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am glad to know that that understanding has been entered into, and I sincerely hope that the Senate may agree to it. I think it is a very wise and provident change in the proposed rule, and it seems to me that it should remove all objections to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator says that he thinks an hour and a half ample, that such a limitation will tend to more cogency and directness in debate. Of course, that goes without saying. I have seen, for instance, the leader of the House of Representatives, at that time Nelson Dingley, beg for two minutes' time in the House of Representatives, and in that two minutes he said a great deal that was of value, and would have said more. But the Senator from Mississippi is overlooking, from my point of view, the most valuable right that he has under the present rule. Suppose there was some measure here affecting vitally the interests of Mississippi, what Senator on the other side is concerned in the domestic interests of Mississippi, except the distinguished Senator who now occupies the floor and his colleague?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption there, I can not conceive how any measure affecting the people of Mississippi or the people of Michigan can be a matter of indifference to any Senator who occupies a seat in this Chamber. I should regret very much if anybody should think that I represented alone the State of Mississippi in this Chamber, and that my interest in the affairs of my fellow countrymen was limited to the geographic lines that mark the State of Mississippi on the map.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I will tell the Senator how it can. Take the force bill, which occupied the attention of the Senate for a considerable period, and of the House of Representatives as well. Suppose the rule for which the Senator is now contending had been one of the rules of the Senate and that a Republican caucus had decreed that that measure was to pass, does the Senator think that his State would have been properly protected by a fulmination of an hour and a half upon his part?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, I trust I never will be guilty of fulminating in this Chamber for any purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not use that term in the sense of criticism; I use it in its broadest sense.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to say to the Senator that while I think the force bill and its purposes were infamous, thank God the spirit which animated the proponents of that measure does not exist in the minds and hearts of the American people to-day; but if that infamy had been inflicted upon the people of the South, it would only have brought that great question to an issue and probably would have hastened the solution of the problem which presses upon us so heavily, upon the people of the South, to-day. Congress could have put that measure through, anyway, if it had so desired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It could not have put it through under the rules.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If that be true—if the privilege of unlimited debate is to be prostituted for the purpose of defeating the public will or the will of the majority—then I can not subscribe to it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; neither could I; but I want to say to the Senator that the public will was not defeated, according to every Senator on that side of the Chamber who spoke on the force bill, and the public will was not outraged when the former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, and the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] consumed an extraordinary amount of time on the river and harbor bill. The country was not outraged when I took the floor and, in the exercise of my right under the rule, prevented the culmination of a program parceling out all of the balance of the days of that session until the Senate consented to vote upon the bill to admit the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico as States of this Union. I say to the Senator—and I do not want to take up too much of his time, but I know he is conscientious and able and wants to do the right thing—that the instances where this rule of unlimited debate has been abused and has worked to the disadvantage of the Government are very rare indeed and the cases where it has been of tremendous advantage to the Government and to the people of the United States can be counted by hundreds and hundreds.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator does not think unlimited debate, as the term is employed by him, is necessary in order to convince the Senate, does he?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I think it is.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In the instances used by the Senator, unlimited debate was simply a means of killing time, and defeating the rule of the majority, which is contrary to the very genius of our Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; unlimited debate, as I define it, was such a protracted and prolonged discussion as to bring acutely to the minds of Senators the necessity of composing that particular situation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator is using the term "unlimited debate." I think a better term for him to employ would be "filibuster." The purpose of discussion is to illuminate, to give to the Members of this body all of the facts and reasons for the measure. That is the purpose of debate. It is not to kill time; it is not to defeat a measure; it is not to bring about the passage of a measure. It is to give the Senate the benefit of what the Senator knows; and I hold that there is not a Senator in this Chamber who can not pretty well empty his mind upon any subject, if he is careful in his arrangement of the facts, in an hour and 30 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I agree with the Senator; and yet, as I said last Saturday standing at the desk where the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] now is, I have heard the late Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan, discourse by the hour intelligently and instructively in this Chamber; and his words of wisdom have been followed by men who were not at that time under the spell of his eloquent voice.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; I understand that the Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan, could talk about any thing or subject from a pebble to the stars, entertainingly and instructively; but I am quite sure that the erudite Senator talked about a great many things in those long discourses which were not pertinent to the question before the Senate. Now, I have no objection to a Senator giving me the benefit of his information—really, I covet it—but I do not think it is necessary for him to consume more than an hour and a half in doing so; and if the Senate wants to hear him further, if the Senate is not ready to act upon the matter, if it needs more facts, if it desires the subject reasoned out further, the Senate will always extend to such Senators as the late Senator Morgan, for instance, time to give the Senate the information which is in their possession.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to trespass upon the time of the Senator; but out of my experience and observation, covering a great many years, I have seen some marvelously wise changes of public sentiment affecting national policy. For instance, when we first began discussing the canal across the Isthmus, with a view to its construction, the Senator from Alabama and myself I think both voted for Nicaragua when the matter came up in the House of Representatives; and yet over here, under the wider latitude of discussion, under the greater power of the individual Senator to force his views upon his colleagues, even at the expense of a prolonged discussion, that whole plan was changed and the canal across the Isthmus at Panama resulted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. For information, may I ask whether Mr. Morgan was in favor of the Nicaragua route or the Panama route?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He was in favor of Nicaragua, I think, at the time.

Mr. CUMMINS. And his long speaking, therefore, did not accomplish very much in that direction.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I did not say that his speaking at that time had accomplished very much; but I do remember what was accomplished on this side by the late Senator Hanna and Senator Spooner and others who forced their arguments upon the Senate to the point where it was willing to consider the practical aspect of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I beg to remind the Senator from Michigan that the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Hanna, who probably was the determining influence in the change, never occupied a single hour in continuous speech upon the subject in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken; there was much discussion and no caucus could decree that they should act. If this amendment to the rules is adopted, I want to say to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Mississippi that it will result in the crowning of King Caucus in this Chamber, a thing that now can be forbidden and thwarted. The caucus decrees will take the place of the individual power of Senators in the determination of public questions.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Michigan speaks out of the warmth and enthusiasm of the moment and that he may not prove, by the statement he has just made, a correct prophet.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope so, too; but I think my statement is correct, nevertheless.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, while the question is not before the Senate at this moment, I trust I may be permitted, without offending against the rules of the Senate, to express my approval of the amendment offered by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] providing for open discussion of treaties, and so forth.

I listened to the great speech delivered by the able Senator from Idaho in this Chamber a few days ago in support of that amendment, and I want to take this occasion to pay to him the tribute of my respect, admiration, and gratitude for the irrefragable argument and the unanswerable logic presented in that address. Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to the performance of any official function behind closed doors. I despise everything that scents of a secret caucus or a star-chamber proceeding. They are unholy and obnoxious memories. No good deed ever sought the shadow, and the man whose acts are commendable does not object to the sunlight of publicity. I do not want any secret diplomacy or any other sort of secrecy in the performance of a public function. Rather do I prefer that the blessed sunlight of publicity shall shine in upon every congressional discussion and official act performed by a Member of Congress or an officer of the United States Government. There is no influence quite so potential for good, so corrective of evil, so stimulating to do the right thing, as publicity. Next to the all-seeing eye of Infinity, the sleepless watch of an intelligent constituency will serve to keep the Congressman in the straight and narrow path of duty. There is a world of wisdom in the advice of Robert Burns to his young friend, Andrew, embraced in the lines:

The fear o' hell's a hangman's whip
To haud the wretch in order;
But where ye feel your honour grip,
Let that ay be your border;
Its slightest touches, instant pause,
Debar a' side pretences;
And resolutely keep its laws,
Uncaring consequences.

The pernicious custom of considering treaties and doing other official things in secret comes down to us through the lapse of ages, from the time when men ruled by "divine right" and perpetrated a fraud upon God Almighty and humanity by the exercise of usurped authority. The custom was born of a lack of confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the people. It was first practiced by those who held the people as their chattels and committed every damnable deception which they thought necessary to work their scheme and machinations by keeping the people in ignorance of their methods. I have never known a question considered by the Senate since I became a Member of this body which I thought the exigencies of the case made it necessary to conceal from the American people the truth. The people whose toil produces the money with which the taxes are paid, whose earnings maintain the Nation's commerce in time of peace, and who shed their blood in defense of the flag in time of war are entitled to the truth. They are entitled to know everything that their representatives do, their reasons for doing it, and their methods of doing it—in a word, they are entitled to know all about their Government. This Government belongs to the people; the Members of Congress are but the hired public servants, commissioned to perform a definite function for a fixed salary and for a certain length of time. The people understand what is necessary to be done to make their Government responsive to their wants and their necessities; and the sooner Representatives in Congress recognize the capacity of the people for self-government and by their acts show that they understand also their proper relation to the people and the Government, the better it will be for all concerned. I would rather trust the feelings and the composite good judgment of the masses than the logical processes of any man or small coteries of men in authority. No Republic ever perished from the earth that drew its strength from the people; no democracy ever died whose just powers of government were derived from the consent of the governed. Republics fall and upon their ruins are erected autocracies when the representatives of the people fail to respond to the wishes of the people and refuse to do the bidding of their masters, the people.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly in regard to the pending rule.

The amendment which, I understand, was accepted by the Senator from Alabama, prepared by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], of course, very greatly improves the rule as originally reported, in my judgment; but my objection to the rule is as a matter of principle. This is not a question of cloture. We have a cloture rule which has been adopted by general assent, and which, in my opinion, has shown itself entirely sufficient to prevent anything that is known as filibustering. Three times here we have secured the necessary number of signatures for the imposition of the cloture rule, and in every case it brought an immediate agreement to take a vote. This is something entirely different. This is a general rule to limit all debate, indiscriminately, on every measure, whether trifling or of the gravest importance, affecting the Constitution, the welfare of the entire country, or the interests of a section of the country, or what may be the vital interests of a single State. Mr. President, I believe that a rule of that kind is thoroughly unsound in principle, and I think we ought to retain in the Senate the general debate and the latitude of debate which we now have.

The case for free debate in the Senate has never been better stated than in a paragraph I am about to read from a well-known book. It is there said:

> It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice, and to embody the wisdom and will of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served; and unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct. The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but, more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration. The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of their being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.

That, Mr. President, is taken from Congressional Government, pages 303 and 304, written by the present President of the United States, and I think it would not be easy to find a more powerful exposition of that necessity for debate which, I think, is infringed on by this proposed rule.

I do not care to argue the principle further. I think it is wrong, and I shall vote against the rule on that account. I shall also vote against the rule because it is both needless and pointless. I say it is needless. Mr. President, there has been no delay by debate on any war measure since the war began. I think that is admitted. There has been no attempt to hold up by parliamentary obstruction any measure.

I have been looking over some accounts of the bills in "The first session of the war Congress" and I have selected only the most important bills as I ran my eye over it, to give an idea of the absolute groundlessness of any possible suggestion that war measures have been delayed in this body; still less have they been delayed in the House. I take a few examples.

The first bond-issue act, a bill of the utmost importance, authorizing a great loan of $4,000,000,000, as I remember, was reported in the Senate on the 16th of April. It, of course, went over one day under the rule. It was passed on the 17th.

The Army appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, was reported in the Senate on April 9 and passed on the 11th.

Now, where did the delay come? The conference report was not accepted until May 8, 19 days in April and 8 in May, making 27 days in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And this rule would not apply to conferences.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to develop it a little more fully as to where the real delays come.

The resolution to authorize the President to take over enemy vessels was reported in the Senate April 30 and passed the same day and by a viva voce vote. There was no conference.

The Army conscription act is a bill which involved a subject of very great debate, on which there were very earnest differences of opinion. It was reported in the Senate on the 28th day of April and passed on the 1st day of May. There had been some previous debate on a similar measure, a Senate bill, which was taken up in the Senate April 21. Allowing debate on both bills, from April 21 to May 1, there were 10 days. The conference report was accepted on May 18. It was 17 days in conference.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator recall how long the conscription act was before the Parliament of Canada?

Mr. LODGE. I do not. It was before the Parliament of Great Britain for three years.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and it has been before the Parliament off and on in Australia for the last four years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is there yet.

Mr. LODGE. It was the subject of a popular referendum, if I remember aright.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is there yet. It has never been enacted.

Mr. LODGE. But we passed it in the Senate in 10 days.

Now, take the sundry civil appropriation bill last year, the great appropriation bill. I am giving just a few appropriation bills as an illustration, because if there was any purpose of delay there is nothing so pertinent as delay on an appropriation bill properly or improperly used. It was reported to the Senate on the 9th of April and passed on the 11th. Of course, reported on the 9th it was not taken up until the 10th. It was reported the following day.

Mr. GALLINGER. And appropriated a billion?

Mr. LODGE. No; I refer to the regular bill of last year. It carried $147,000,000 only; it was a small bill. That went into conference. It passed the Senate April 11, and went into conference and the conference report was accepted on the 7th of June. It was, I think, 26 days in conference.

The war appropriations act which carried $3,281,000,000 was reported in the Senate May 15, taken up on May 16, and passed May 19, in three days. It went into conference. It was there 12 days in May and 13 days in June. It was 25 days in conference.

Mr. BORAH. The longest delay in the Senate has been over the river and harbor bills, about which there seems to be more sensitiveness than any other measure.

Mr. LODGE. I was coming to the river and harbor bill later.

The espionage act, a very important bill, which gave rise to many questions, the House bill was reported in the Senate on the 9th day of May. There had been some debate preceding that on the Senate bill. It was passed May 14, 5 days after it reached the Senate. It was then in conference for 27 days.

The aviation act was reported in the Senate July 17 and passed July 21, and there was no conference. It carried $640,000,000. I trust I shall not be regarded as making a treasonable remark by stating that there has been some delay in getting airplanes for fighting on the line. Nearly a year elapsed before we got any at all. I do not know that we have many on the line now, but the delay was not in the Senate. It was brought into the Senate July 17 and passed July 21 by a viva voce vote. It was in the Senate only four days. I do not know how much debate there was. I think it was not taken up until the day it passed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I happen to recall about that bill that it came very nearly passing within 20 or 30 minutes after it was submitted to the Senate. One Member objected and asked that it go over until the next day. The next day and the day succeeding the Senate was engaged on other business. Then perhaps after 20 minutes' talk when the bill was called up it was passed. It actually did not receive the attention of the Senate over 30 or 40 minutes altogether.

Mr. LODGE. Now, I come to the food-survey act, which aroused a good deal of debate, and justly. It affected the people of this country and their daily lives in every way. It was reported in the Senate on the 29th of May and passed on June 2, three days' debate. Is that too much? Is that delay? But the conference report was accepted on August 8. It was 37 days in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me, I think most of the time of the discussion was taken up by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. LODGE. No; I am coming to his bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Anyway, he discussed it, and I wish he had been discussing it yet. We should have legislated much more intelligently than we did.

Mr. LODGE. I am coming now to the more important one—the food-control act.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it may be well, inasmuch as this proposed amendment to our rules comes from the majority side of the Chamber, to take note of the fact that the conferees of both Houses had a majority of Democrats, so that the delay in the conferences could not by any possibility be attributed to the minority side.

Mr. LODGE. That is undoubtedly true. The conferences are not in control of the minority.

The food-control act, that went much further than the food-survey act, was of very serious nature indeed. I remember hearing something at the moment to the effect that there was delay. I think possibly it was suggested that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] delayed it, but I make no objection to his discussing it thoroughly or what he did, because I think he did great good by doing it. It was reported in the Senate June 27. It was passed in the Senate July 21—24 days. That was a bill of very great moment. I do not think the debate was too great.

Mr. REED. And during that interval, if the Senator will pardon me, the Senate conducted its other usual business, and I think passed a large number of other bills.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly. All that time was not given to that bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That bill also dealt with the fuel question, did it not?

Mr. LODGE. It did.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It vested great powers in the Fuel Administrator?

Mr. LODGE. It did.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I think it is the general consensus of opinion in this Chamber that if the bill had been still under discussion we would have had more coal last winter to keep us from the cold than we had.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to avoid these burning questions.

Mr. REED. But it is proper to say that the very important amendment relating to taking possession of coal mines and of the coal business was developed in the Senate. One of the committees of the Senate during the pendency of debate brought it in and added it to the pending measure, so that the Senate not only had to consider the bill that came to it, but had to create a bill during the period of time referred to.

Mr. LODGE. I think the debate was well spent. It was not given to that bill all of that time. The bill was subsequently in conference for 18 days.

The second bond issue, carrying $4,000,000,000, was reported in the Senate September 13 and passed September 15.

I now come to the bill which, I believe, is proposed as the official cause of this rule, and I think it is worth examining. That is the revenue bill. A bill for raising revenue, which includes, of course, tariffs as well as taxation, as far as my experience goes, and I think I have been taking part in framing something like seven or eight, always takes a longer time, both in the House and in the Senate. It is inevitable that it should. It is composed of a multiplicity of items, and whether it is to raise revenue by duties on imports or by taxation, it affects all the business of the country, and every business has a right to protest if it thinks that it is discriminated against or unfairly affected.

This revenue bill differed in no respect from others. It took a long time to get it through both Houses and turn it into law. As we are told that this is needed in order to shorten debate, especially on that bill, I want to analyze the time occupied in that bill.

It was taken up by the subcommittee of the House, as nearly as I can get the exact date, on the 15th of last April. It was taken up by the full committee on May 1. It was reported to the House on May 9. It was 24 days in the House committee. It was 14 days in the House. It then came over to the Senate on the 23d day of May. It was 74 days in the Senate committee. I can testify as a member of that committee that no time was lost, and no committee within my knowledge ever did harder or more incessant work than they did on that bill.

The House had had no hearings, and the result was that everything was pressed upon the Senate committee. The Senate committee had the great pleasure and privilege of having all its colleagues here in session at the same time, and almost all of them felt that they ought to be heard. That, of course, was something the committee could not refuse. They brought, as they had a right to do, their constituents before the committee, and by the hardest possible work—and that includes the time when the bill was recommitted—74 days were taken by that committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry? Where is the $2.50 wheat bill now?

Mr. LODGE. I have not forgotten it. I shall call attention to it in a moment.

After 74 days in the committee the bill came to the Senate and was 35 days before the Senate—more than a month. That seems a long period of debate. I had charge once here of a bill which was the organic act of the Philippines. It was seven weeks before the Senate. It was a very important measure, but I was in charge of the bill, and I thought it took a long time. People in charge of a bill usually do. It was before the Senate for 35 days. It was 31 days in conference. In debate in the two Houses on that bill 49 days were occupied, and in conference and in committee 129 days were occupied. Is it any wonder I say this is utterly needless?

This is not the place where the delays come. I look at this history of appropriation bills on the back of the calendar. The legislative, executive, and judicial bill was reported to the Senate on the 9th of April last. It was not taken up for several days, because my memory is that it passed in two or three hours one morning. At all events, it went out of the Senate on April 16 and went into conference April 19. Where is it? It has stopped where? Has the delay on that bill occurred in this body? I am not blaming the conferees of either House. I am showing the utter needlessness of this rule.

There is the Agricultural appropriation bill, to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] referred. It went to conference on the 5th day of April. I think it is still there. That was a bill which had been well debated here, and yet it has been in conference, as I have stated, ever since the 5th of April; that is, two months. The legislative and executive appropriation bill has been in conference for nearly two months.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to inquire who controls conference committees, with absolute secrecy, and, as a rule, without any publicity to the people at large?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to make any partisan remark at all of any kind; but I will say that conference committees are controlled by their several majorities. They vote, of course, as Houses; but the conferees of each House are controlled by their majorities. I make no party allusion in respect to it, because I do not think this rule is the product of party. There is no party gain of any sort or kind to be had by this rule. This rule is an administration measure. We all know it.

Now, I come to what I say makes the rule entirely pointless. If it could be arranged to have bills prepared in the departments and brought in here and passed as they are passed in the Mexican parliament—which some of the older Senators here have heard the late Senator Bacon, of Georgia, describe with great picturesqueness—if bills could be prepared in the departments and sent in here, and passed without any debate at all, I could understand the reason for the administration desiring this change of our rules. It is something new, however, for the administration to change the rules of either body, but we have so many new things that it is not worth while to dwell on that. But nothing will be effected by it. There will be plenty of opportunity, even under this restricted debate, to bring out any truths that it may be thought desirable to bring out, whether they are unpalatable truths or agreeable truths. There is abundant opportunity for criticism, if any one chooses to make it.

So far as delay goes, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is in charge of the resolution and who is very familiar with the parliamentary procedure of both Houses, knows as well as I do that anyone who wanted to conduct parliamentary obstruction—which no one does—could do it under this proposed rule just as easily as under any other.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts if, in his opinion, this new rule would not give cogency to the decree of the party caucus?

Mr. LODGE. Why, Mr. President, it would check debate and would hasten the enactment of party measures I suppose, but the point I was trying to make was that I had shown, I think, conclusively, that it is needless. Since the war began there has been absolutely nothing in either House to justify the cutting off of debate. I have also shown that it is pointless and ineffective for the purposes, as I understand them, of the administration, which is behind the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to ask if the Senator can devise a better method for prolonging debate than is contained in this very proposed rule, which provides for 20 minutes' debate on every amendment? Now, we will take any appropriation bill, or the revenue bill, and we may legitimately offer a thousand amendments to any one of those bills, if we desire to filibuster or prolong debate. Is not that true?

Mr. LODGE. That is absolutely true, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I only returned to the Senate this morning——

Mr. LODGE. That makes it a greater pleasure for me to yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, the Senator from Massachusetts always yields to me very gracefully. My purpose in interrupting the Senator was to inquire by what authority he made the statement, which he did a moment ago, that the proposed amendment to the rules was an administration measure? I ask the question because I have been out of the city, and I should like to know what there is to that statement.

Mr. LODGE. That is merely my opinion from the observation of actions and conditions.

Mr. THOMAS. It is the Senator's conclusion, then, from the conditions which he regards as convincing, although circumstantial?

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly satisfied that Senators of the majority would not of their own motion have produced this rule, and I see a zeal in its support which I think comes from only one source.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I think the Senator from Massachusetts is wrong so far as the chairman of the Committee on Rules is concerned. The Senator from Alabama has been pressing for a year or more a rule similar to this one; this is really a compromise on the rule which he has been pressing from time to time. So far as it being an administration matter, I do not think there is anything in that statement.

Mr. LODGE. I know nothing about that; but if it existed it was a gentle pressure.

Mr. OVERMAN. I never heard of any pressure from any source.

Mr. LODGE. It was a gentle pressure from the Senator from Alabama, and was born in the absence of any comparative harm.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will recall that, so far as I am individually concerned, I have been the advocate of some sort of a cloture rule ever since I have been here, and that without any administrative or other pressure.

Mr. LODGE. Well, the Senator's wishes have been complied with, and I hope he will not find the personal sacrifice too heavy.

Mr. THOMAS. There will be none whatever. The sacrifice will come in the probable defeat of the rule.

Mr. LODGE. However that may be, it seems to me to be pointless for its purpose, and is wholly needless to begin with.

My objection to it, however, is an objection of principle. I do not like to see this attempt to break down the freedom of debate in the Senate, which, whatever its defects may be at certain moments, in the main is, I think, extremely important to the country, and which certainly since the beginning of the war, as I have demonstrated by the time spent in debate, has produced no harm whatever and been no cause of delay. I relieve the majority of responsibility, because I can not see that they have the slightest gain to make by it; and I have not observed any greater reluctance to take time on the other side of the Chamber than on this.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say. I am against the resolution on principle. I repeat, that I think it is needless, pointless, and ineffective; and it only remains for me to say a single word as to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. With that amendment I can not agree. It is wholly in the power of the Senate by a majority vote at any time to discuss any treaty in open session. I think that is a sufficient protection to the country, if there is any reason why a treaty should be discussed in the open; but, as a question of principle, it seems to me very undesirable to adopt a rule requiring all treaties to be discussed in open session.

The present rule is founded on good sense; which is that in the free discussion of a treaty it is almost inevitable that things may be said in debate which might have a very prejudicial effect upon our international relations. It is no answer to say that what is done here in executive session gets out. What is done does get out, but very little of what is said is divulged. Moreover, what is said is not a matter of record; and that is all-important when dealing with foreign relations.

I am no lover of what is ordinarily known as secret diplomacy. I think the day is past when secret treaties can be made by a few men sitting behind closed doors, and secret articles inserted which never come before the parliamentary bodies or the public in any way.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I should like to ask the Senator if the United States has with any foreign power any secret treaty?

Mr. LODGE. None; we can have none; they are impossible under our Government; no treaty can be made which binds the United States which has not been ratified by the Senate. Therefore, secret treaties, in the ordinary sense of the word, can not exist in this country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day discussed the subject in a very able way, but I was impressed with the fact, as it appeared to me, that the evils of which he complained were due to secret treaties, and not to the fact that discussions concerning them were in secret.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly. I think, Mr. President, that there is not the slightest danger in connection with any treaty of great importance to this country that there should ever be a failure to have ample information about it given to the public; but I am old-fashioned enough to believe that better treaties are made by trained and experienced men whose debates from day to day are not public than by public treaty making. We have had a specimen of public diplomacy, if it may be so called, in the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, and somehow or other it has not created a feeling of confidence about that method of making a treaty. Russia sent three totally ignorant men to meet some of the ablest men of Germany, and the result is before the world. I do not think that open diplomacy, of which, as I recall, the President in one of his messages spoke not unfavorably, had a very good first result. But open diplomacy is a very different thing from secret articles and secret and unknown treaties, which can not be made here.

On the other hand, some care is necessary in grave international controversies and agreements, and I think that they can be best dealt with under the system which has always been pursued in the Senate. Therefore, Mr. President, it is impossible for me to vote for the amendment. It is also impossible for me to vote for the proposed rule in any form. It is improved by the larger latitude given by the Cummins substitute, but the principle remains the same, and I do not believe in putting that general fetter on debate in the Senate. I think it is wrong in principle, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I wish to speak for a few moments at this time because I was very greatly impressed with the record presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. While he was reading from the record I turned to the calendar on my desk.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I took two examples from the calendar.

Mr. HARDING. I probably missed those examples.

Mr. LODGE. I read from the calendar of appropriation bills on the back page of the calendar, which is very instructive.

Mr. HARDING. I find by reference to the "History of bills," as printed on the back of the calendar, one or two points of very considerable significance to me, in view of the fact that we are led to understand that the Chief Executive is back of this proposed change in the Senate rules. It is rather interesting to note that the Agricultural appropriation bill, which came to the Senate on February 11 and passed this body on April 4, has not yet been agreed to in conference. The Indian appropriation bill, which came to this body in February and was passed on March 28, was sent to conference on April 4, and the conference report agreed to on May 17; but the bill has not yet been approved by the Chief Executive. A similar story can be told of the legislative appropriation bill, and the Military Academy appropriation bill which came to the Senate on May 22, was passed on May 23, and sent to conference on May 31.

There is rather an astonishing record, Mr. President, regarding the Post Office appropriation bill, a measure which might well have excited considerable controversy in the Senate. It was reported to this body on April 2; it was passed on May 16, and is still lacking the sanction of a conference committee. A more striking story is made manifest in the second urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which this body had but 8 days until it gave its sanction, and it required 12 days thereafter for the same measure to secure the approval of the Chief Executive.

I speak of that because I should think it would be an impertinence and an affront on the part of the United States Senate to tell the Chief Executive within what length of time he must give his approval to a measure which has had the sanction of Congress, and if that be true, the converse is true; and I have no hesitancy in saying to this body that I consider it none of the Chief Executive's business as to what rules shall govern the processes of legislation and debate. I know, Senators, that that is rather an impolitic thing to say in a time like this, but I am speaking without any personal or political feeling in the matter. In the first place, I am not personally pinched by the rule proposed.

I do not know that there is any record, save one, that I ever made a speech of more than an hour in my life. On that occasion I was commissioned by a late and greatly honored Member of this body to speak for an hour on a political platform at a time when he was addressing a great overflow meeting, and he required 30 minutes to do that, and then, because of the state of his health, he required 30 minutes' respite before he could resume. I refer to the late Senator Hanna. I was young in politics at that time and rejoiced at the opportunity thereby afforded me, and in my enthusiasm I spoke for an hour and 10 minutes. When I took my seat, amid some manifestations of success in my endeavor, I rather ostentatiously asked how long I had spoken, and the chairman of the meeting said, "An hour and 10 minutes," and with a modesty that I think ought to have been becoming, I said, "Well, that is too long," whereupon a very dear old superannuated minister, who had been on the stage for about two hours and a half waiting to hear the then distinguished Senator from Ohio, ripped out his comment, and he said, "Yes, sir; an hour too long." [Laughter.] From that day to this I have been rather cautious as to the time consumed in speech making.

I think, Senators, that an hour is ample time for essentially any address worth while; but there is a very marked distinction between a speech or an address on a fixed topic, for a fixed occasion, and illuminating and helpful and thorough debate. It is very easy for me to understand how a man who has his subject well in hand, who knows about what he is talking, and is impelled by a real purpose to add some illuminating information to discussion, can consume more than an hour.

I understand very well that the proponents of this change of rule say that any man who has a real message, and who has real occasion to speak more than an hour, can secure permission to do so by the unanimous consent of the Senate; but I warn you now that if anyone on the majority side seeks to limit such discussion or debate, or any man with a personal grievance desires to do the same thing, one objection makes unanimous consent impossible. While I never expect to find myself called upon to ask unanimous consent to continue a speech in this body, nevertheless I am protesting now against the surrender of the privilege of full and free debate; and I warn you, Senators on the majority side of this Chamber, that if you adopt this rule you will regret it so long as the present majority party survives.

I dislike very much to disagree with the eminent men who are the sponsors for and supporters of this rule, but I object to it for several reasons. In the first place it is absolutely unnecessary. I have been hearing about the reformation of the Senate since I first entered politics; and it was rather an ironical thing the other day that one of the most emphatic speeches made in favor of the adoption of this rule was uttered by the very latest arrival in this body.

I have been observing the Senate at close range now for three years. I came with the notion that the Senate "fiddled" away a great deal of valuable time in debate, and I am still of that opinion; but the debate that needlessly consumes the time of the Senate is not reached by the proposed rule. If there is any practical way of getting at it, I should like to support a revised Senate rule that would confine Senators to discussion germane to the pending question; and if I had my way in the Senate there would not be so much promiscuous talk on every subject under the sun during that morning hour.

Why, it was only the other morning when the very interesting and sometimes startling Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] intruded his personality and his hobby while the pending measure was before the Senate, and discussed the elimination of the Supreme Court from the Government of the United States by congressional action. It is a ridiculous thing, I admit, that the practices of the Senate will permit such a thing. I do not think that ought to be; but so long as a Member of this body is addressing himself in sincerity and earnestness to a pending question there is not a reason in the world why he should not have all the time that any conscientious man asks to devote himself to that subject.

Mr. President, this is a great body for debate. I started to phrase my sentence a little differently. I started to say it is a great debating body. It is not always great. It is often petty. It is often exceedingly small, and sometimes insincere. Why, I have seen more time wasted in the United States Senate over a question of parliamentary procedure than over some great measure of infinite national importance. I do not wonder sometimes that people are led to criticize on that account. But the proposed rule is not going to modify that, and the proposed rule is not going to cut off a single Senator from debate, if he has the determination to talk. It only makes him resort to trickery.

Some one has said that the administration wants this rule adopted in order to accomplish the speedy passage of the revenue bill. Why, Mr. President, I can assert my senatorial privilege and sit at my desk and write 100 amendments and send them to the desk and ask that they be printed, and under the privileges granted by this rule, and if I am then so lacking in conscience in the exercise of my senatorial privilege I can talk for 20 hours under the very rule proposed, and there is no one in the Senate who can stop me. You can not expect the Senate to limit its debate by an arbitrary rule. This body, like every other American institution, can only be governed by conscience and intelligence; and I say to you frankly that in the three years I have been serving in this body I have yet to see but one harmful violation of the decencies of the privilege of debate, and that one instance was so timed that it came at the enforced or constitutional adjournment of Congress, the only time when such an abuse could be made possible; and that one abuse has been so regretted from that time to this that it is never likely to occur again.

I think there are times, Mr. President, when a filibuster may be justified, but there never will be a filibuster again in the United States Senate that will be harmful to the best interests of the United States of America. If it is desired to delay legislation at any time, it can be accomplished under the rule proposed; but that, Mr. President, is not a satisfactory way to arrive at things. I want to feel that the Senate still controls its own destinies. Moreover, the new cloture rule is ample. I am opposed to the so-called reformation of the Senate in the name of a war measure.

I have the conviction that American intelligence is getting a little weary itself about this everlasting proposition to do things in the name of the war. The modification of the rules of the Senate has nothing to do with the war, and the delay incident to Senate debate has never been applied to a single war measure that was necessary to add to American efficiency in war.

We have heard much about the reformation of the Senate. We had the proposition for the popular election of Senators as one method of bringing this great body a little closer to the people and as another means of eliminating wealth in its influences to elect men to office. I do not hesitate to stand here now and say to the country that the popular election of United States Senators has added ten times to the expenditures connected with sending men to the Senate which were practiced prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment. I am pretty familiar with some of those things in the history of the country in the last 25 years. My honored colleague [Mr. POMERENE] was the last man, if I remember correctly, elected from the State of Ohio by the legislative ballot, and he has his place along the line with such distinguished Ohioans in his party as the noble old Roman, Allen G. Thurman, and George H. Pendleton. Nobody in all the world ever questioned the election of any of these men on the ground of the application of financial force; and on the Republican side we had some of the most distinguished men who ever served the Nation in a legislative capacity, who honored themselves and the State and the Nation and this body, and they were elected to this place and commissioned almost without the expenditure of a dollar under the old established system of senatorial elections.

There were occasional abuses, to be sure, and out of charity I make no allusion to them; but I do say that the popular election of United States Senators has led to a much heavier expenditure of money in political campaigns than ever existed before, and in addition to that it has attuned the senatorial ear to that ephemeral popular sentiment which is not always a safe guide for a man in public service.

Beyond that, we took the further step of nominating men by popular primaries, to reform the Senate. I have no prejudices on the subject, because I am the first beneficiary of it in the State of Ohio, and I speak absolutely without feeling in the matter; but I do not hesitate to say that popular nominating primaries have added 500 per cent to the expense of men who seek to enter upon a political career. If you are confident that it has elevated the standard of the Senate, I yield to the impression, because, not having served here before I am not fully competent to judge.

But the reformation of the Senate has long been a fad. I came here myself under the impression that there ought to be cloture and limitations on debate; and the longer I sit in this body, the more convinced do I become that the freedom of debate in the United States Senate is one of the highest guaranties we have of our American institutions.

Why, Mr. President and Senators, I challenge anyone on either side of the floor of this body to say that universal military service, the so-called draft act, would have been adopted by the Congress without the extended debate that we had on that subject. Under the limited rule proposed in this resolution, if literally enforced, we would have had our armies to-day under the volunteer system, when everybody is agreed to acknowledge now that compulsory universal military service in this country is the finest manifestation of the American spirit developed by the war.

There is another very interesting illustration. I am sorry that the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee is not on the floor. I listened to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on the revenue bill passed last year, and heard him in two full afternoons of illuminating debate. I think he presented his case with ability. At any rate, he was so forceful that the Senate came to his point of view, and gave its sanction to the bill he reported; and yet the chairman of the Finance Committee, with the necessary references he was obliged to make, consumed not less than eight hours in debate before this body. I heard no one complain at the time.

There was not any occasion to complain. The man who serves in this body and is not in touch with the reporting committees needs the debate. He needs it to inform him, and I will say to you, Mr. President, though I may be very much of an exception, that I have had occasion to change my mind through an interested hearing of senatorial debates. I do not suppose that happens very often on the majority side of this Chamber. Perhaps it would not happen with me if I were on the majority side, where the legislative program is fixed, but I am speaking now for the minority, and in the name of the minority I protest—though I do not pretend to include them all—against the modification of a Senate rule which has permitted that freedom of discussion and that expression of thought which has been responsible for intelligent American public opinion. I tell you now, Senators, that dependable, intelligent public opinion is the law of the Republic, and the man who expects to ride himself to popularity and distinction on the ephemeral whims of the moment will come to failure.

Mr. President, one is a little reluctant, I am at least, to speak in opposition to a proposition which comes from the Chief Executive in this hour of the Republic's anxiety, and I make allusion to it because it has quite become the custom of the country, so soon as a Member of this body does dispute the mandate of the Chief Executive, to proclaim him as opposed to the war and hampering its successful progress. I want to take this occasion to say that I do not think an American patriot has to be repeatedly proclaiming himself. It may be that I am just a little bit sensitive about those things, but I never thought that the purchaser of a liberty bond had to wear a button to be square with his conscience. I have no objection to those things. I love to salute the service flag in the window of an American home; I think that is eminently befitting; but it has never occurred to me that I must everlastingly be proclaiming myself in favor of winning the war nor that I must go about on the house tops shouting my support of the President when the record of votes in the United States Senate is ever much better authority. Yet it is quite the custom nowadays, and a very unfortunate indication of the trend in the Republic, to proclaim a man against the war and untrustworthy and out of sympathy with American desires if he does not blindly follow the Chief Executive in everything proposed.

I am not called upon to speak on this particular phase of the situation very often, but lest some one misunderstands and lest some one succeeds in his misrepresentation, I want it written in the record of this discussion, in my open and insistent opposition to the Chief Executive in demanding this change of rule, that I am for every war measure that is necessary to wage it until Germany is humiliated and brought to terms. I am willing to vote to consecrate and devote the last American breath to bring about the necessary triumph of this war in behalf of our American ideals of civilization. So let us have no doubt about that. But I feel that I should be surrendering some of my obligations as an occupant of the United States Senate if I did not have some ideas of my own as to the rules of this body and some of the measures not directly concerned with war.

If the Chief Executive of the United States sincerely believes that it is for the good of the country and necessary to the winning of the war that we modify the rules of the Senate, I ask him now, I ask you Senators now, why does he not employ the accepted practices of the Chief Executive and come and state his reasons to this body, as he has been doing, and has done repeatedly—and with my entire approval, I may say—and share with the Senate the responsibility of changing these time-worn and long-established rules? If the Chief Executive will stand on the rostrum of the Senate or the platform of the House and say to the people of the United States of America that he believes it is absolutely essential to the effective legislative program for the war to modify the rules of the Senate, which have been in existence since the establishment of this body, and that he speaks for the American people in wishing a modification, I believe, under those circumstances, I would surrender much of my individual conviction on the subject, because I am a cordial believer in American harmony and universal confidence necessary for the winning of the war.

But, Mr. President and Senators, the Chief Executive never comes to Congress to advocate anything but the obvious things. When he wants a modification of the rules we get the word indirectly that this is the desire of the Executive. Let it be so. Let us have a desire of the Senate. I think it is no more the business of the Chief Executive what the rules for the procedure of the Senate are than it is the business of the Chief Executive to tell the United States Supreme Court what the rules of procedure shall be before that body.

I think the Chief Executive is going just a little bit far when, as a war proposition, the United States Senate is asked to surrender its notion of rules of procedure and, as a war measure, put a limitation on debate.

It has been said before in this body, and I delight to repeat it now, if this rule is a good thing in time of war, it is an infinitely better thing in time of peace, because, Mr. President, under the stress and strain and the modifications of war there are more important questions coming up in the Congress of the United States than the Republic ever faced—more important than it ever was called upon to solve heretofore. I want ample time for discussion in this period of evolution and alteration in the government of the Republic.

We have been discussing at times some of the changes made. Everyone is agreed that we are getting away from the form that was intended by the founding fathers. We are likely to have an altered economic system. We are undoubtedly changing and transferring from the legislative branch to the Executive enormous grants of power. No one pretends to dispute that we have to-day the most autocratic power in the hands of the President that any ruler ever held since civilization has known of rulers of nations. I am not objecting to that, Mr. President. Much of it seems necessary. I only object to some of the grants that I do not think are necessary to the winning of the war. I want the President of the United States to have every grant of power he needs to concentrate and consecrate all of American energies and power and intellect and patriotism to the winning of this war. I am not finding fault about that; but the President does not need to modify the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know that the Senator heard the very cogent and important suggestion made by the President and read by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]——

Mr. HARDING. I did.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When he said that it was vastly more important to have discussion in a legislative body than legislation.

Mr. HARDING. I am glad to have the Senator from Michigan call my attention to this expression from the President. I sometimes think on these problems not related directly to the activities of the war I had rather take the judgment of the President as a student of the affairs of the Republic than I would his judgment as an Executive in a time of stress and anxiety and some of the unavoidable prejudices of partisan alignments.

I think very highly, Senators, of the President of the United States. I am not jealous as a partisan of his eminence as a leader in the affairs of the world to-day. I am mighty proud that an American has taken the position that President Wilson has without any of the petty jealousies and the lack of devotion that are sometimes shown to one of the opposite political party. I wish the President could be as generous in putting aside his partisanship as I feel at all times.

However, Mr. President, I will not venture on that field of discussion lest I say something that I have it not in my heart to say at this time. I do not want to make any partisan appeal either to the Senate or to the country. We have gotten quite beyond that now. The big thing is the winning of the war, on the one hand, and the preservation of the American Republic, inherited from the fathers, on the other. While we have not done so much as some of us have wished toward the winning of the war, there is an accumulating endeavor in that direction and growing preparation; and I have every confidence in my heart that America, having already given a very creditable account of herself, is going to give a vastly more creditable account of herself only a little later on. I have not the slighest doubt about the outcome of the war, Mr. President. I pity him who calls himself an American and has a single doubt about the outcome of this world conflict. If I believed it were possible for the barbaric Hun to win this conflict, I would say God is no more and civilization is dead. There can be no other outcome, and personally I have rejoiced that that barbaric enemy sent his sneaking undersea boats to the Atlantic coast.

I am sorry, of course, for the loss of the lives connected with that visit, and I regret the loss of the tonnage and the cargoes which were wasted in a time when the world is anxious about its supplies; but the Kaiser never did a better thing for America than to send that murderous expedition over here, because it brought those of our country who are not yet fully committed to the war to understand just how great and necessary a task we of America have assumed. It has brought our people to understand that, whether we would have willed it or not, it was inevitable that we were to be drawn into this great struggle, and America would not be worthy of its boasted name and would not be fit to survive if we had not cast our resources and our energy and all that we have into this tremendous conflict to save might and fright from the domination of the world.

It has been good for us that we had that visitation. How my heart rejoiced to read the story of the men flocking to enlist at the stations of the Marines and the Navy after that Hun visit! Nothing was ever more illustrative of that latent American enthusiasm and determination which we have only to command to demonstrate our forcefulness. There have been, of course, some single instances that appealed to our sentiments very beautifully. I remember one out in a town in Ohio when the torpedo-boat destroyer Jacob Jones was sent down by a submarine in British waters and most of her crew was lost. One of them had been a young schoolboy in Newark, Ohio. Of course, his sacrifice was no more important than a million others, but the loss of that young American on the Jacob Jones appealed to his chums and associates of Newark, and the next day 17 of them were on hand to enlist for service in the American Navy to avenge his death. Do you tell me that a Republic inspired by that spirit, with our resources, can lose in the end of such a conflict? Impossible, Mr. President.

It may be delayed, but, Mr. President, the seriousness and solemnity of the situation does not demand the abdication of the United States Senate, and until somebody rises on this floor and points out an essential war measure that has been delayed by the Senate practices of debate there is not an excuse for the change of the rules that you can take to the country and enlist popular approval.

I say that, Mr. President, to the distinguished Senator who is in charge of this proposed change, because I hold him in as high esteem as a Member of this body can have for any big and able servant of the American Republic, and I marvel that UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, leader that he is, would be willing to surrender the Senate's right of full and complete debate.

Why not address ourselves to the more practical things? I suppose the Members of this body are reluctant to put excessive power in the hands of the Presiding Officer. I can understand that presiding officers, since conventions and mass meetings were first instituted, since assemblies were for the first time gathered together, have been possessed of exceptional power and often abuse it, and the man who wields the gavel and is not just in his decisions can work many an injustice; but I should not be very much afraid to clothe the Presiding Officer of this body, it little matters who he may be, with authority to require Senators to address themselves to the pending question. If you will do that and then insist that Senators shall not drag before this legislative body every public topic for discussion, and read every sensational editorial that is printed anywhere in the country, and follow that up with discussions about telegrams and letters which have no place in this body and ought to have their responses made from the senatorial offices; and then, if in addition to those things you will only persuade the Senators on the majority side of this body to do their work, there will not be very much hindering promptness in the Senate.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] looks upon me in a questioning way, and I venture to tell him that I have served on some three or four committees in this body where all the work except presiding is done by the minority side. I have had occasion not once but many times to spend many hours in the consideration of measures which were to be brought before this body and the only working factor of the committee in charge from the majority side was the chairman.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean by his reference to me, listening to his very interesting remarks, that that reference has any connection with my belief to the contrary of what he is asserting upon the minority doing the work? Does he refer to me and then to that fact as in any way intimating that I have been disputing it?

Mr. HARDING. No, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I only wanted to elicit his confirming testimony, as I knew I would by making such a reference. More than that, Mr. President, I had at one time in mind to allude to several of the Senators who are honoring me with their attention in order to put into the RECORD that they were present. It is an interesting thing, and I do not allude to it from any sense——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, he certainly could not do that without shortening his speech very much. He would not even consume as much time as the proposed rule would give him.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator does me too much honor.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator was speaking a moment ago in regard to conferring the power upon the Presiding Officer and the jealousy with which that question was guarded. The Senator will remember perhaps that many years ago a resolution was offered to confer upon the Presiding Officer, the Vice President, or to the President pro tempore, the power to determine whether a speech which was being delivered was germane to the subject or whether the debate was reasonable.

Randolph and other great Democrats denounced such a plan, insisting that the power of debate should not be restricted either by conferring the authority upon the Presiding Officer or by any rule, and that in this forum there should be free and unlimited debate, not only to protect the rights of the States but to protect the rights of a minority.

Mr. HARDING. I am glad to have the Senator from Utah make that interruption. I was not familiar with the movement made to change the rule. I think I should very much dislike to have an arbitrary man in the chair who would be empowered to pass upon the appropriateness of any remarks I might be making to the subject then pending, yet I can see that such a rule would be a very healthful cure of the situation against which we complain.

When interrupted, Mr. President, in perfect good humor and with no desire to criticize, I was making allusion to one of the difficulties in speeding matters up in the Senate. I suppose, under the existing circumstances, when the Executive assumes so much of authority, it is perfectly proper for the majority side to just let things run and know they will come out all right. But note the impressions one must gather to-day, for example. Here is the proposal of a rule which, if in effect 20 years ago, would have permitted the enactment of the force bill which was intended to make effective the amendments to the Constitution. Very naturally there was filibuster and unending debate to prevent the enactment of such a measure. Yet to-day, when the question of changing the rules and overturning an institution inherited from the fathers is before the Senate, there are six members of the majority present, not including the distinguished Presiding Officer [Mr. KENDRICK in the chair]. I rather think that if I belonged to the majority responsible for the record this body is making when so marked change is proposed I would be on the job. It only illustrates one thing—that the Senate is surrendering its participation in the responsibilities of government, and we are drifting all along to leave it to the Executive, and we are leaving it to him.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to ask him in regard to the proposed change. I concede that according to my judgment, if the thing were practicable, it would help matters a great deal. The Senator proposes that we shall give a power to the Presiding Officer of the Senate to confine all debate to the subject pending. I want to ask the Senator if the very suggestion of that change does not presuppose that in his own mind there is an evil here that ought to be remedied?

Mr. HARDING. I grant it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then we are seeking to remedy what I presume is conceded to be an evil, and the only thing is how it should be done. Does the Senator think that the granting of that power to the Presiding Officer would cure the evil? Then, if it would, what would the Senator say in regard to the danger that I think he, thinking man that he is, has to concede the abuse of such a power might bring on? I think the Senator can remember a good many instances where under that rule an arbitrary presiding officer might have absolutely thwarted the will of the Senate very easily by a technical and arbitrary ruling, ruling men out of order without a sufficient reason.

Mr. HARDING. I am well aware that the Senator from Nebraska raises a very interesting question and points out a very probable danger. After all, about the safest guaranty of the righteousness of men in public service is the conscience of the men. I have thought that the abuses in the Senate which are incident to the freedom of debate ought in all reason to be corrected by the convictions of the men who constitute this body. I do not arrogate to myself any exceptional qualifications, but I know the Senate record will bear me out when I say that I have trespassed very little on the time of this body. It may be that I did not know enough about pending questions to presume to ask time, but I am very sure that I have never dragged in extraneous matter and consumed the time of the Senate in that way. Unless I be offending now, I think I have a reasonably clean bill.

I can see, Mr. President, how an arbitrary Presiding Officer could very offensively impose on this body under such a rule as I have suggested about the insistence upon the appropriateness of discussion to the subject pending—the measure pending.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree, of course, with the Senator, that he has not trespassed and that he has done just what he has said he has, and yet I want to ask the Senator, taking his own remarks to-day—and they have been exceedingly interesting and enlightening—but taking his own remarks on the question now pending, which is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that treaties shall be considered in the open Senate, does not the Senator think that a Presiding Officer who was inclined to be arbitrary might have kept the Senator himself from saying a great deal that he has so well said to-day?

Mr. HARDING. The answer is simple to that question. That would be quite true if the rules were being literally enforced. I should have been called upon to reverse my order of speech, and I might have made some remarks on the so-called Borah amendment and postponed my remarks on the main resolution until a fitting time. There is not any doubt in the world that an arbitrary Presiding Officer, under the proposed rule limiting Senators to discuss germane to the pending question, could restrict Senators in a very disagreeable way and could many times cut off discussion that might be very essential to the pending subject. I am only alluding to that rule as a possible cure of some of the evils of the Senate. I think one of the most helpful cures that we could possibly have would be to cut out discussion that has nothing to do with any pending measure; which no one intends to have anything to do with the pending question. I used an illustration, occurring early in my remarks, when I called the attention of those who honor me with their attention to the speech the other day of the Senator from Oklahoma upon a subject that was in no wise before the Senate. I am frank to say that I think there ought to be a rule to hold the Senate to the discussion of the question which is officially before it. Of course, there have been some good results, I must admit, out of discussions before this body that were not upon formally pending questions.

There has been rather an interesting evolution or transformation, Mr. President, since we entered the war. When we started out in this tremendous undertaking there seemed to be a fixed policy of dealing with the enormous problems of production and preparation under the leadership of a charming lot of theorists, who had never done anything in all their lives except to theorize and to proclaim. The investigations of the Senate, which have brought forth debate on this floor from time to time, have resulted in an entire change of policy, which has been mightily helpful to the country. Some Senator called my attention a while ago to the fact that we never would have had Mr. Schwab at the head of the ship production of the country at this time if it had not been for debate upon the floor of this Chamber. I do not know whether or not that is exactly true, but it is very certain that we would not have had the ship-production program speeded up and made efficient if we had not had investigation and discussion.

I know, Senators, that there has not been one single thing to whip the productive energy of this country into great and effective preparations for war except the investigations of the Military Committee of this body and the attendant discussion upon the floor of the Senate. Suppose we do waste an hour, or two hours, or four hours, or days—and the Senate does waste days—what is that if the freedom of debate brings to light the real truth concerning any great pending question?

Senators, if you wipe out the freedom of debate in the Senate, where does it remain in the United States of America? Mr. President, I suggest a little more limitation of debate on the soap boxes of this country, where they are preaching the destructive anarchy which made Russia an impotent and pitiable spectacle, and a little more freedom of discussion on the floor of the United States Senate on the part of the men who are charged to speak for the American Republic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the savants of the dry-goods boxes are in favor of the governmental policies, drifting toward a universal power in this administration over everything in private life, there is no restraint, let me say to the Senator, because they are convenient instruments of the administration; but I wish to inquire of the Senator further, after making this preliminary statement, if he is not aware that this limitation of debate proposed in the Senate is part of a general conspiracy fitting in with George Creel and the amendment to the espionage act, by which the freedom of the press is now limited to the judgment of George Creel, and the free speech of the Senator and of myself and of other Senators, as well as of other citizens of the United States, is now limited by the petty despots in the shape of deputy marshals who are rambling about over communities? I should like the Senator from Ohio to elaborate upon the question that freedom of speech is dead in this country in so far as the administration can strike it down; that freedom of the press is in the same lamentable condition; and that it is sought further to hamper and destroy the freedom of debate in the Senate by just such measures as this. This is the only place left where there is any freedom of discussion.

I should like for the Senator, at least before he takes his seat, to elaborate somewhat upon this question. I think it is a part of a general conspiracy to destroy the freedom of discussion in this country. I do not charge that against the Senator who proposes the rule or to others who support it; but I do charge it, as the deliberate intent of the administration and of the head of the Executive department that he does not court discussion and is restless under any speaking of the truth. If he had his way about it there would be no discussion in the Senate to-day, and there will be less in it under the administration if the President can limit it.

I repeat, there is no freedom of the press left in this country, and much less freedom of speech, unless it is secured as the result of a writ of habeas corpus in this Republic. I propose to see just how far it will go outside of this Chamber; and I challenge the administration to a test of the constitutional principles before the Supreme Court as well as the trial courts.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I do not know that I am a fitting spokesman to make an extended answer to the very interesting inquiry of the Senator from Illinois. In the first place, the Senator has rendered me a very great service, and has added emphasis to the argument which I have been trying to make, in this rambling way, because he has just now introduced a very interesting phase into the discussion; and I find I have already talked more than the time proposed in the new Senate rule. If the rule were in vogue or in enforcement at this time, I should be obliged to take my seat.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator from Ohio would not be obliged to take his seat. I could ask for the Senator, or the Senator could ask for himself, the privilege of continuing, when the request would be submitted to the Senate, and if a majority concluded he could go on, he could do so.

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, who always has the right explanation; but the Senator from New Hampshire, if he had been content to complete his illumination, might have said that any individual Senator in the Senate Chamber could prevent my going on.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; it would take a majority vote to do that, under the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which has been accepted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I acknowledge my failure to have kept in touch with all of the proceedings. I am not aware when the amendment to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers was adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But, Mr. President, by the time the Senator from Ohio had been accorded the unusual privilege of speaking more than one hour, he would have entirely gotten out of the warmth and interest which attends his speaking now. A Senator may speak on an amendment, but not continuously. The Chair may recognize any other Senator for an amendment and the Senator from Ohio could not then complete his speech until late in the afternoon. That, however, is not the point. The proposed rule would abridge the rights of Senators and reestablish the dominance of the caucus.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if I may get away for a moment from the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] to answer the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I will say that I quite agree that the Senator from Michigan states the point. I want the freedom of the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not believe Ohio is greatly different from other States of the American Union. You may think so from the representation of the minority side of the Chamber, but really in Ohio we think a place in the Senate is of considerable importance and a very great honor to bestow on a citizen, no matter how occasionally an unworthy one may come. We have thought that the Senate was a fitting place to send men of known integrity and of suspected capacity and reasonable reputation for doing things. I know that is not always the rule, but in the State of Ohio we still feel that the Senate is a body of some importance and that it has something to do with the Government of the United States, and is not merely a collection of automatons, where, by playing on the keys, some greater intellect shall register his will and proclaim it through this medium and transmit it to the people of the Republic.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has raised a very interesting question. I do not know how much design or intent there is to limit discussion, to abridge the right of freedom of speech and our boasted freedom of the press. Confessedly we have enacted measures to place limitations on both the right of utterance and the right to print. I am not sure but some of those abridgments have been necessary in this emergency. America found itself in the beginning of the war in a condition that no other country on the face of the earth had experienced. We were honeycombed throughout the Republic with disloyalists; we were not strictly an American people; and, thank God, Mr. President, the correction of that is the great compensation of this war, for when it is done we shall have burned the dross from this collection of so-called American citizenship, and when that is done we shall have the pure gold of a truly patriotic American people in this Republic. That is our great compensation, and if we got nothing else it would be worth the billions expended and the lives sacrificed of those who have come so patriotically to the service of this country.

We entered the war with a mixed and unconsecrated citizenship and with a large percentage seeking to undermine our efforts and rend our concord. This endeavor was founded on prearranged plans. Nobody was more surprised than Germany when there was not an uprising in this Republic to stay our hands against participation in the war. There could be some very interesting testimony, Mr. President, from high places along that line; but we met the situation with such practicability as we could.

I quite agree with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] that there has been a very dangerous trespass and a very threatening restriction of boasted American liberties. I am not going to grieve if these restrictions in the end contribute to American good, but the Senator raises what is to me a more important question. How shall I answer it, Senators? I am infinitely more concerned about the aftermath than I am about the winning of the war. I am so close to an important subject that I do not believe I will speak, Mr. President, without more deliberation; but there are men in power in this Republic who ought to have no instrumentality of power in their hands; there are men in this Republic to-day who are holding positions of influence and have at their command channels that are reaching every American activity who would completely destroy this representative American Republic. They are like the Russians, who want to establish a complete and pure democracy; and I tell you, Mr. President, that I choose to go on record as saying that when the day of pure democracy comes for the United States of America the Republic will end and popular rule will end. A pure democracy has not survived since the beginning of civilization. We Americans, through the wisdom and the inspiration of the founding fathers, inherited a representative Republic, and, Mr. President, I fear very much that through the agitation we have had and the trials we have suffered we Americans have not yet come to have the sense of appreciation to preserve this representative form.

I tell you now, Senators, that you are undermining it every minute of this great world war, and you are undermining it in the name of war; that is the pity. When we shall have won, as we will win, this great conflict of the world, we still will have the larger task on our hands of reestablishing the inherited American Republic, representative in type, just as the Senate was intended to be; and, though he may be mightily sincere in his purposes, the man who advocates a pure democracy for the United States of America is as great an enemy to the Republic as the German who would undermine our institutions. Yet in power everywhere in our governmental institutions are the advocates of this fundamental change, and there is not a single thing proposed that will have more to do with the completion of the change than the muzzling of debate in the United States Senate. Mr. President, while I am willing to vote everything that genius can suggest in the way of legislation to make us effective in the war—and I am willing to do it with that necessary degree of patriotic blindness which will speed its passage, I want to say now and on this occasion that, for one, I demand full freedom of debate for the problems that are before us.

Mr. President, referring for a moment to an inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] relating to the Borah amendment, if this new rule is to be adopted, it ought to carry the Borah amendment, although ordinarily I should not be in favor of it. I am in favor of sufficiently open diplomacy, but I myself very much doubt the wisdom at all times of discussing treaties in open session of the Senate. I can understand why that might be a doubtful policy; and I had much rather retain the rule as it is, and open the doors when they ought to be open, or open the doors when it is perfectly consistent to open them. I would rather have the rule right, and make the exception to meet such necessities as may arise.

Some Senator has argued that we could adopt this rule and change it later on. Mr. President, we are not making any changes in war that will be altered later on. That is the trouble. Patriotism will pass every necessary bit of legislation now unquestioningly. There is not the slightest argument—and I challenge the utterance of such an argument—that can be made for the passage of this rule as a war measure. I call upon its supporters to stand upon this floor and give me one good reason why we should alter the rules of the Senate as a means for furthering our effectiveness in war. It can not be done, Mr. President. But if any can assert such a reason, then I shall turn right around and declare that if there is a single argument for its adoption now, there is five times as much argument for its continuation after the war is over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would it not be a very convenient rule to have in case the undiplomatic Col. House negotiates a treaty and thrusts it in here for ratification?

Mr. HARDING. Ah, Mr. President, perhaps the Senator from Illinois has not heard me. I said that, if this rule is to be adopted, I want the Borah amendment also adopted, so that what little discussion we do have relating to treaties shall take place in the open forum. I am not going to discuss the minister extraordinary and personal, Col. House. I do not know what possible arrangements will come at the end of this war, and I am not concerned about any, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, save one—Germany brought to terms; and then the conscience of the civilized world can arrange a suitable treaty of peace. Nothing less than that will do. I can state my terms for this war to the world: Germany humiliated and made to surrender; peace, with victory over the Hun. You can make that your platform, and the American people will be back of it.

Mr. President, I ought to apologize for consuming so much time. It is one of the misfortunes of a man who undertakes to express himself as to some of the things that he has been mulling over in his mind without preparation that he consumes a great deal of time and rambles and touches upon a little of everything; but, on the whole, that is one phase of Senatorial debate that is very interesting to me. I have seen discussions start out here along particular lines in connection with which inquiry and interruption have brought out the very things that we needed to hear. It has been the one great, helpful thing in debate; and I tell you, Mr. President, you can not have unlimited debate in the Senate attended by interruptions without time for such discussion. I can get up here and read an essay or read a speech, call it what you will. I am a newspaper man by occupation; I do not read well, but I can write voluminously; and in an hour I might read a speech that would cover the subject more fully than I have even attempted to do to-day, because under the process of writing without interruption I will stick to my line of attack; but, Mr. President, I am very much afraid if I should read it in this body I would have to corral the Sergeant at Arms and request him to save me enough pages to accord me a hearing.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I wish to say that the length of a speech is not the measure of its merit. More often than otherwise extreme length of speech is a certificate of its lack of merit; but, nevertheless, there are themes and there are times and there are inspirations when a speech in debate may well run over two, three, four, or five hours; and I charge you, Mr. President, that there will be speeches of that sort ere long. While the Senate may not listen, because the Senate does not listen very attentively to anybody, I discover, though Congress may not be apparently concerned and though the galleries of this body may not be filled to add their inspiring attention, I charge you now, Mr. President, that the people of the United States of America will be listening. This is the one central point, the one open forum, the one place in America where there is freedom of debate, which is essential to an enlightened and dependable public sentiment, the guide of the American Republic.

I charge you, Senators, let us not because of an insincere claim that it is a war measure, let us not, even at the behest of the Chief Executive, who has not yet seen fit to come and ask it of us in an open way and take his share of responsibility, fling away freedom of debate, but let us rather look for the correction of the abuses of the Senate to the conscience of the men who hold seats in this body, Americans all, who are ready to support every measure necessary for the winning of the war and then turn to the still mightier problems of peace, looking forward to the fullness of debate and the freedom of expression for that illumination of great subjects which ought to be the guiding light to the actions of this Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes I should like to ask him if he will not comment briefly on this phase of the intellectual composition of the human mind? I know that seems to be a contradiction, but it has various phases. Our physical anatomy requires about so much roughage——

Mr. HARDING. Well, the Senator has had his share to-day, I hope. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I do not wish to denominate what the Senator has said in that way. He has in a manner deplored the fact that he has not had time to prepare and digest in a more condensed form what he has had to say on the question, and has declined to enter upon other interesting discussions, because, perhaps, he was not prepared to deal with them in that form; but I wish to ask the Senator further on this subject if running discussions, in what may be called the unprepared debate, growing out of inquiries and the quick give and take among Senators who may have different opinions, do not develop more of real value than all the polished, documentary, tabloid essays which are delivered to empty seats and which produce mental dyspepsia?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have no license to become a doctor of mental dietetics. I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is quite right in his statement that we need roughage. I know he is right in his statement that in the rough and tumble, easy-going debate we develop a great many things here that we otherwise would not have.

I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I am a great believer in the prepared speech. I think a man never does himself justice unless he prepares a speech in studious deliberation. I wish I could do it. I have attempted it here and failed. I want to make this clear: I like the prepared speech that is brought to the Senate Chamber in the expectation of appealing to those who hear it, and to those of the Senate and the Congress who read it in the RECORD. I must say, Mr. President, at the risk of being misunderstood, though I am sure I mean to be as generous as one need be, that I have not very much use for the speech delivered in the Senate for home consumption—I mean, if I must be more specific, the carefully prepared speech which is to become a campaign document—because I think that is a waste of the time of the Senate and the printing facilities which this body commands. However, much that ought to be said can be said more succinctly, more directly, more forcefully in the prepared speech than in the open debate; and yet I want the Senator from Illinois to understand that in this fullness of discussion and the interrogation and the reply and sometimes the irritation that obtains, we get information in the debates of the Senate that we otherwise would never possess.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate now to discuss the main resolution, but I wish to say a few words on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] that if this resolution is to pass it should contain the Borah amendment or the substance of it. We ought not to go on record now in favor of the secret making of treaties.

Mr. President, after the very able speech of the Senator from Idaho it would be presumptuous for me to discuss at length the amendment offered by him providing for consideration of treaties in open session of the Senate. But I am not willing to let this resolution come to a vote without briefly stating my position. Mr. President, with this appalling world calamity, brought on by the sordid ambitions and secret machinations of the German ruling dynasty, with all our pretenses about publicity, I am not willing to cast my vote in favor of a system which is to-day receiving the condemnation of the civilized world. The eyes of all nations are now turned toward this country. There never has been a time when our action would have had as much influence in shaping the destiny of nations as at present. It is unnecessary for me to refer to the pages of history for confirmation of the statement which has been made that many of the wars which have afflicted mankind all down through the ages have been brought on by the plottings and schemes of ruling powers of nations, by secret diplomacy, in which the people had no part and of which they were not informed.

The history of the Hohenzollern dynasty is one long record of concentration of power, of secret plotting to extend dominion, of perfidious violation of the most sacred promises and the ruthless disregard of people's rights. This has been the history since the days of the Marks of Brandenburg. The great Frederick, who is to-day held up as the Hohenzollern ideal, bound himself and his country by the most solemn secret agreements; violated them with impunity before the ink was dry; engaged in the most corrupt system of diplomatic intrigue and bribery which, even then, in the low stage of public morals, shocked the courts of Europe. But his standard has been the ideas toward which Prussia has struggled from that day to the present time. We know the great Bismarck brought on the Franco-Prussian War through his schemes for aggrandizing the Prussian power, even going to the extent of altering a telegram of his master, the King of Prussia, to precipitate hostilities. We know that the slimy trail of Germany's corrupt intrigue, perfidy, bribery, espionage, and crime, unparalleled in the annals of civilization, has been for years, and is to-day, reaching every country, neutral and belligerent, and threatening the stability and integrity of honest government. We have seen its effect in Russia, in Turkey, in Mexico, in Italy, and even in England, France, and our own country. It is a notorious fact that the Turkish people, so far as they were permitted to express an opinion, were proally; that German intrigue, bribery, and corruption accomplished more there than German militarism. We know that the consequences of this policy nearly wrecked the cause of Italy and submitted her fair lands to brutal invasion. What would have been the effect upon the German people had that nation known of the secret agreement between Austria and Germany, had they been informed of the real cause of the war, had they been familiar with the negotiations of Count Lichnowisky, the German ambassador in England, at the time the war broke out? If any confirmation is needed that the cause of this war was the brutal, unbridled greed and ambition of Germany, he has candidly furnished it in his private memoranda, which were published within the last 60 days. This startling document should be read by every German citizen and every American citizen. I quote some of the statements which show that the German people were kept in entire ignorance of the cause of the conflict into which they were blindly led:

> Sir Edward Grey went through the Serbian answer with me and pointed out the conciliatory attitude of the Belgrade Government. We even discussed his proposal for intervention, which should insure an interpretation of these two points acceptable to both parties. With Sir Edward Grey presiding, M. Cambon, the Marquis Imperiali, and I were to meet, and it would have been easy to find an acceptable form for the points under discussion, which were mainly concerned with the part to be taken by Austrian officials in the inquiries at Belgrade. With good will all could have been cleared up in two or three sittings, and a simple acknowledgment of the British proposal would have brought about a détente, and further improved our relations with England. I therefore urged it forcibly, as otherwise a world war stood at our gates.
> In vain. It would be, I was told, wounding to Austria's dignity; nor would we mix ourselves up in that Serbian matter. We left it to our allies. I was to work for the localization of the conflict. It naturally needed only a hint from Berlin to induce Count Berchtold to content himself with a diplomatic success and put up with the Serbian reply. But this hint was not given. On the contrary, we pressed for war. What a fine success it would have been.
> WE INSISTED UPON WAR.
>
> After our refusal Sir Edward asked us to come forward with a proposal of our own. We insisted upon war. I could get no other answer (from Berlin) than that it was an enormous "concession" on the part of Austria to contemplate no annexation of territory.
>
> Thereupon Sir Edward justly pointed out that even without annexations of territory a country can be humiliated and subjected, and that Russia would regard this as a humiliation which she would not stand.
> The impression became ever stronger that we desired war in all circumstances. Otherwise our attitude in a question which, after all, did not directly concern us was unintelligible. The urgent appeals and definite declarations of M. Saonoff (Russian foreign minister), later on the positively humble telegrams of the Czar, the repeated proposals of Sir Edward, the warnings of San Giuliano (Italian foreign minister), and of Bollati (Italian Ambassador in Berlin), my urgent advice, it was all of no use, for Berlin went on insisting that Serbia must be massacred.

The more I pressed, the less willing they were to alter their course, if only because I was not to have the success of saving peace in the company of Sir Edward Grey.

So Grey on July 29 resolved upon his well-known warning. I replied that I had always reported that we should have to reckon upon English hostility if it came to war with France. The minister said to me repeatedly, "If war breaks out, it will be the greatest catastrophe the world has ever seen."

SIR EDWARD GREY STILL SOUGHT PEACE.

After that events moved rapidly. When Count Berchtold, who hitherto had played the strong man on instructions from Berlin, at last decided to change his course we answered the Russian mobilization—after Russian had for a whole week negotiated and waited in vain—with our ultimatum and declaration of war.

But I did not intend to make a speech upon the subject of secret diplomacy. No one claims that the executive agents in negotiating a treaty should daily publish to the world all of their conversations and arguments, pro and con, in arriving at an agreement, although if on great vital points it might be advisable to do so.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts cited the Bolsheviki treaty of Brest-Litovsk as a pernicious example of open diplomacy. I believe it to have been a very fortunate occurrence that when this treaty was negotiated all the circumstances surrounding it were made public and held up to the derision of the world. No one claims that the Senate should entirely disqualify itself from considering some treaties or some phases of a treaty in secret if cogent and convincing reasons at the time should so dictate. I think it would be well for the Senator from Idaho to accept an amendment that the Senate could at any time upon a two-thirds vote, the same vote required to suspend a rule, and perhaps upon a majority vote, go into executive session on any treaty. But what I do claim is that the Senate of the United States, the coordinated treaty-making power of this Nation, can not afford at this time to go on record before the world in favor of secret diplomacy. But it is said that the open consideration of treaties in the Senate might offend foreign powers. So long as the system of secret negotiation of treaties is continued, foreign powers may have some ground for complaint if we consider ours in the open. But what we should aim to remove is the system, and foreign powers will be more cautious in making their treaties and more scrupulous in their maintenance if they are made in the light of the world, where the reasons therefor are understood by the people of the several countries; and I believe the danger of offending foreign countries is small. A frank and open discussion of the differences between nations is as beneficial as the frank and open discussion of the differences between individuals.

Senators, do you not believe it would have accomplished a good purpose if the plottings of Germany in this country from 1914 to 1917, which I believe were well known to many of our officials, had been made known to the world, and the American people had understood their full import?

Treaties are a part of the law of the land. They are the highest authority controlling the action of nations. They are made for the benefit of the people. They should be made in the light of the open. We should trust the people and they will trust us. A treaty made in this way will be a more solemn, binding agreement and the Nation will be more ready to demand its enforcement than if they feel it was made without their knowledge and participation. Of course, I do not advocate submitting a treaty to a vote of the people. This is a representative Government, and the duty of making treaties is delegated to the President and to the Senate. But the system of secret negotiations and ratifications of treaties tends to undermine the confidence of the people in their representatives and is now leading to impractical socialistic moves of the direct management of foreign relations by the people as a whole. Let us not, by any action of ours, encourage this growing sentiment, but let us rather strengthen the hands of representatives.

Mr. President, as has been said by the Senator from Idaho, at the close of this war there must come a day of settlement, when most of the nations of the world will gather around the council table to seek to adjust differences, bind up the wounds of war, and start again on the pathway of world peace. A mere glance at the vast gulf of discord now existing between nations, peoples, and races is sufficient to impress us with the magnitude of the task. Our soldiers are now fighting upon foreign soil, fighting for the freedom of the seas, for the right to govern ourselves, for the protection and perpetuity of our institutions against the boldest assault since Alexander attempted to subjugate the world. Whether we wish or not, we can not escape the consequences of the war or of a final adjustment between the contending nations.

Of surpassing importance to us are the principles on which the conflict is waged and upon which peace shall be finally restored. Let not only the terms of that settlement, but the impelling reasons therefor, be known to the world and sanctioned by the people of all nations. No treaty which has ever been made since man recognized government authority has been so far-reaching in its effect, of such importance to the welfare of nations, as the one that must come with the close of this war. I for one am not willing to indicate now by my vote that that treaty shall be made in secret.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator, as I understood him, advocated publicity in both the negotiation and the consideration of the ratification of treaties.

Mr. KELLOGG. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator to use the expression "negotiation of treaties."

Mr. KELLOGG. I said that no one claimed that all the discussion in the negotiation of a treaty by the executive agents should be published from day to day. I said that if some of the questions were of very great importance it would be well to make the substance of them public, but no one claims that every executive agent must publish everything he says across the council table in discussing a treaty. But the ratification of the treaty in the Senate is a discussion of the principles involved in the treaty and the reasons why it should be made, and at the close of this war those reasons are going to be of surpassing importance to the American people, and why should they not be discussed in the open? That was the point I wished to make clear.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator is perfectly correct when he says that no one claims that all the conversations to and fro across the table where a treaty or the protocol of a treaty is being formulated should be made public, but what I meant to suggest by the question that I asked the Senator was this: There is no way in which Congress can provide that the beginnings of the formulation of a treaty can be controlled by Congress, is there?

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all; of course not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And it is so, if I correctly understand the situation, that whatever undesirable provisions are put into treaties are largely put there by diplomatic officers appointed by the executive branch of the Government, and there is no publicity whatever about that. There is where the great damage is done, if there is any damage. The country does not necessarily know that the Executive is negotiating with anybody about any treaty. The Executive simply instructs the foreign ambassador, or appoints an unofficial paramount representative, responsible to nobody, to go over and discuss matters and have what they call pourparlers about things.

The President does not even consult the Senate, the other half of the treaty-making power. He can, out of his own mind and for his own purposes, without representing anybody, start in to negotiate a treaty and perfect the negotiation of the treaty with any nation or group of nations in the world that he pleases, and every foreign ruler may do the same, as I understand the situation. There, in my opinion, is the danger of secret diplomacy. The mere debate upon the terms of the treaty after one has been sent here seems to me to be not nearly so essential as the publicity of what has gone before.

I believe we have amended treaties, though that is not a proper phrase to use, because we can not amend one; we can only suggest amendments to the other party. There is no specific power given to us by the Constitution to do that, so far as I am aware, but it is a matter of custom and usage, as a mere suggestion that if the other party to the treaty shall agree to the suggestions made by the Senate, then the chances are that the Senate will ratify the treaty; but even that does not necessarily follow, because I think it is a fact that when the suggestions of the Senate have been agreed to the composition of the Senate has sometimes changed meantime, and then the treaty was not ratified.

All I meant to suggest was that nine-teaths, if not ninety-nine one-hundredths, of the objectionable secrecy in treaty making is in the negotiation of the treaty and not in the fact that the treaty is considered behind closed doors in the Senate and then immediately made public.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is true that the agent who negotiates a treaty is a purely executive officer, and we have no power over him. If he is one of the diplomatic representatives of this country, he has been confirmed by the Senate, but frequently he is not a diplomatic representative of the country. He is generally a special agent appointed by the President to negotiate a treaty. It is true, also, that many of the mistakes may occur in the negotiation of the treaty in the first instance, and it is also true that with most foreign countries they do not require a ratification of a treaty to make it binding upon their country, but it is not so here. After the treaty is negotiated, and the form of it submitted to the Senate, it is well understood by all foreign countries that it is not yet binding upon this country.

I believe on questions of such far-reaching effect and great importance, which must be settled at the close of this war, which now involves nearly all the civilized world, it is even more essential than ever that before that treaty becomes a binding agreement upon this country the reasons for its execution and the reasons for its negotiation should be made known to the American people in discussing it in open session of the Senate, and I shall favor that policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smoot
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Brandegee	Kellogg	Page	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Phelan	Thomas
Culberson	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
Cummins	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Curtis	Kirby	Reed	Underwood
Dillingham	Knox	Robinson	Vardaman
Fall	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Warren
France	McCumber	Shafroth	Watson
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard	Willey
Gronna	McNary	Sherman
Harding	Martin	Simmons
Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STERLING. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho. The amendment is to strike out the word "four-fifths," in line 3, and substitute the words "a majority" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will change that to three-fourths I will accept it, for I do not think it is a fair test of the situation to have simply a majority control the rule. I would accept, however, an amendment which provided for three-fourths.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is in order at this time. As I recall the parliamentary situation, the resolution is an amendment itself and the Senator from Idaho has offered an amendment to the amendment. This would be an amendment in the third degree. Of course, the Senator from Idaho can modify his amendment if he desires to do so.

Mr. STERLING. I did not understand that to be the parliamentary situation. In lieu of the resolution I suppose the amendment of the Senator from Idaho was offered, and I have suggested an amendment to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The resolution itself is a committee amendment.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Connecticut is correct about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order. The Chair rules that the point of order is not well made under Rule XVIII.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I remember, the President of the Senate ruled when the Senator from Idaho offered his amendment that it was an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. BORAH. That was the statement which the Vice President made at the time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That was the ruling of the Chair, and very clearly an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho would be an amendment in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read Rule XVIII.

The Secretary read as follows:

> But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This seems to be a question to strike out and insert.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is to strike out and insert, but mine is not. Mine is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The committee amendment is an amendment to strike out and insert.

Mr. BORAH. But mine is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule seems to be as interpreted by the Chair—

> But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question.

Mr. STERLING. That being the rule, my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho must be in order. The original resolution, together with the resolution in lieu thereof, constitute one question, the amendment of the Senator from Idaho another, and my amendment is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair holds. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho is an amendment in the first degree and the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is in the second degree, and therefore in order. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator from South Dakota does not desire to change it to three-fourths?

Mr. STERLING. I can hardly agree to change it to three-fourths, I will say to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator desires to debate it, I will take my seat.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator from Idaho agree to a two-thirds majority?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will not make any agreement of that sort. It certainly is proper to give the Senate an opportunity to say whether it will permit a majority to decide when we shall go into executive session and when we shall be in public session.

Mr. STERLING. I have not yet made the agreement. I propounded the question to the Senator from Idaho, and I should like to submit just a few remarks relative to the amendment which I proposed.

Mr. BORAH. May I have the attention of the Chair for a moment? I desire, before the Senator from South Dakota urges his amendment, to perfect my amendment, as I have a right to do under the rule. I ask to strike out the word "four-fifths," in line 3, and insert "two-thirds."

Mr. STERLING. Then my amendment would be to strike out——

Mr. BORAH. Let the Secretary state my amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 3 of the proposed amendment, strike out "four-fifths" and insert in lieu thereof "two-thirds," so as to read:

> That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session unless two-thirds of the Members of the Senate, by yea-and-nay vote, shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator from Idaho a question. Does he mean two-thirds of the Members of the Senate or two-thirds of those present?

Mr. BORAH. I mean two-thirds of the Members of the Senate. According to the language which is incorporated in the amendment, I say two-thirds of the Members of the Senate. I put that in purposely, although, if the Senator feels disposed to support the amendment, I might change it to two-thirds of those present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wanted to ascertain to what extent the Senator proposed that the Senate should control it. Under the Senator's construction, then, it will require 64 votes in the Senate in order to go into executive session.

Mr. BORAH. No; on a treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On a treaty it would require practically all of the votes generally present at a session to go into executive session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit a suggestion from me? I notice the language of the Senator's amendment is "shall be considered by the Senate in its open or legislative session." I think the words "or legislative" had better be omitted and that it should read that it shall be considered "in open session" or "open executive session." I hardly think we can consider a treaty in legislative session.

Mr. BORAH. I followed the language of the rule with reference to considering Indian treaties, where it says "in open or legislative session." I assumed there was some reason for using the term "open or legislative session." When the resolution was first offered in the Senate, some months ago, I used the term "open executive session," but in view of the fact that the rule with reference to considering Indian treaties provided for an open or legislative session, I concluded perhaps it would be better to use the language already incorporated in the rule. That is my reason for doing so.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator, and I do it, as he knows, as a friend of his amendment, because I am very much in favor of it. I think we ought to provide that it may be done by two-thirds of the Senators present instead of putting in a provision that would require two-thirds of the membership of the Senate. It seems to me we ought to do that in order to make it possible for the amendment to be adopted.

Mr. BORAH. The only reason why I am making this amendment at all is with the hope of getting some help, because I relied——

Mr. NORRIS. I am satisfied a great many Senators who would vote against it in the other form might be induced to vote for it if two-thirds of the Senators present were to decide the question. Of course there would have to be a quorum voting in either case.

Mr. BORAH. I move, then, to strike out in my amendment the words "of the Members of."

Mr. NORRIS. Would not that be the same thing?

Mr. BORAH. No; two-thirds of those present, a majority being present, which is the Senate for the purpose of legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so; but why would not the Senator be willing to put it beyond a doubt by saying "two-thirds of the Members present," if that is what he thinks it means?

Mr. BORAH. Then you have got to come back to the other proposition. I would not want two-thirds of those present to decide unless there was a quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Two-thirds of those present, a quorum being present.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming that the Senator from Connecticut is friendly to the amendment——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think the Senator can safely assume that.

Mr. BORAH. I offer the amendment, then, in this form: Strike out the words "of the Members of the Senate" and insert "of the Senators present."

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice in another legislative body the phrase is often used "of those present and voting." The fact that they are voting carries with it the presumption that there is a quorum, because they could not do business without a quorum. I suggest "those present and voting."

Mr. BORAH. Very well; I will accept the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see how it reads now. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. In line 3 strike out the words "four-fifths of the Members of the Senate" and insert "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting," so as to read:

That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session, unless two-thirds of the Senators present and voting by a yea-and-nay vote shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

Mr. STERLING. My proposed amendment is to strike out the words "two-thirds" in the amendment of the Senator from Idaho and substitute in lieu thereof the words "a majority," so that the amendment will read:

That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session unless a majority of the Members of the Senate present and voting by a yea-and-nay vote shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator through?

Mr. STERLING. I am not quite through. I wish to submit a few remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it will be observed, of course, that this reverses a standing rule of the Senate—one that has been the standing rule from the beginning—the rule requiring that treaties should be considered in secret session. I am in favor of the rule of the open session. I for a long time have been in favor of a rule providing for an open session for the confirmation of nominations. It has seemed to me somewhat absurd, as we have met in executive session time after time to consider nominations to have the order made for the clearing of the galleries and the closing of the doors when there is no disputed question or disputed nomination before the Senate. I venture to say that in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of every thousand of confirmations here by the Senate in secret session there is no dispute in regard to the confirmation of any. The confirmations have in most cases been made pro forma and as a matter of course. So I am decidedly in favor of a change of the rules in regard to confirmations, and, after reflection, I have concluded that a rule for the open session for the consideration of a treaty will be, on the whole, a beneficial rule.

But, Mr. President, I think the rule should be subject to change by a vote of a majority of the Senate and that no two-thirds or other majority in excess of a bare majority should be required for a secret session. I call the attention of the Senate to paragraph 3 of section 5 of Article I of the Constitution:

Each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy.

Of course, that relates to and covers the secret session, for the Journal may not be secret unless it is made in a secret session of the Senate. But those parts of the Journal shall be published from time to time "excepting such parts as may in their judgment"—that is, the judgment of the Senate—"require secrecy."

The inquiry is, How does the Senate manifest or express its judgment in all cases except in, I believe, four cases provided for in the Constitution? One is on a vote to override the veto of the President, in which a two-thirds vote is required. Another is the expulsion of a Member, when a two-thirds vote is required. Another is the ratification of a treaty, in which a two-thirds vote is required. Another is—

Mr. McLEAN. The submission of a constitutional amendment.

Mr. STERLING. Another is the case of the submission of a constitutional amendment; and there is still one other, which I do not recall just at this instant. Altogether, I think there are five instances, since the Senator from Connecticut has called my attention to this one, in which a two-thirds vote is required; but in each and every other case of action or of legislation, let it be by Senate resolution alone, let it be by joint resolution or by bill before the Senate, either of which must pass both Houses of Congress, the judgment of the Senate on any of them and on the most important and far-reaching and vital matters is expressed by a majority vote, and this under the Constitution.

Why, then, in the very rare case of the ratification of a treaty should more than a majority of the Senate be required to express the judgment of the Senate, not upon the treaty but as to whether the treaty shall be considered in secret or in open session?

Mr. President, I am inclined to think that as a general proposition most of the treaties considered by the Senate will be considered in open session under the proposed new rule, but there will be the rare case where the international relations are such and the dangers of international complications if the terms of the treaty should be known are such that it would be advisable, and it will so appeal to a majority of the Senate, that that particular treaty should be considered not in open but in secret session. Hence, in this as in nearly all legislation, first the judgment of the majority ought to decide one rule of procedure as to whether or not the treaty should be considered in open session or in secret session.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator from South Dakota think that if the knowledge of the terms of the treaty, being made public, would bring on serious international complications those complications had better be brought on before the treaty was ratified and made a binding agreement?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly; but how does that interfere with or affect the procedure in the Senate? I suppose that in nearly all cases the subject of the treaties to be considered here will be popularly and generally understood. The people of the country will understand as to the subject concerning which negotiations between our Government and any foreign power are being had, and the people will have discussed them and known about them before they come to the Senate for discussion.

But, on the other hand, Mr. President, there are treaties which should not be the subject of public discussion, either before their negotiation or at the time of their negotiation or perhaps until they are consummated and ratified. You may take the case, and I do not think it is a very remote one or far-fetched, of the endeavor on the part of a great foreign government to seek the acquisition of territory near American shores that will give that great foreign government a naval base that will be a constant menace to our interests.

In order that our Government may acquire that territory in advance of the Nation seeking to get it for such a purpose, the negotiations with the mother country, the owner of the insular possessions, must be carried on in secret, and the discussion here must be in secret. There are cases of that kind involving grave, delicate, and difficult international relations where it will be obvious to a majority of the Senate that the treaty should be considered in secret session, and a majority ought to decide.

Mr. President, it seems to me that any other rule than the rule of the majority, which governs everywhere else and in the most important legislation, is as much as to say we are afraid to trust the judgment of the Senate as manifested in the ordinary and the usual way, namely, by a majority vote.

I am in favor of the rule as propounded by the Senator from Idaho with this modification, namely, that a majority may determine whether we shall go into secret session or not.

A great deal has been said here in regard to the evil effects of secret negotiations between great powers, negotiations carried on without any knowledge on the part of the people of the States or governments affected, and conclusions have been drawn with regard to what might have happened had the German people known, for example, of the intentions of the Imperial German Government prior to the breaking out of the war.

Mr. President, I think the German people knew fairly well the ambitious designs of that Government, and shared and participated in them, and that any secret treaty or understanding between the Imperial German Government and Austria was not a surprise to the great mass of the German people. I beg to quote a passage here showing the attitude of the German mind. Under the title of "The Causes of German Aggression," I read:

Many people have hugged to themselves with glee the "secret" information that the officers were drinking to the day when war should be declared against England, but few indeed seemed to have realized the splendor of the vision now before German eyes, or the ideas of the international situation which makes victory seem so near as to send German blood coursing swiftly in the anticipation of triumph. The Germans—

Not the German Imperial Government, but—

The Germans aim at nothing less than the domination of Europe and of the world by the Germanic race. One of the fundamental errors, of which idealists and advocates of peace have been often guilty, is to treat this vast project as an unreality. In fact, it is already half accomplished.

This book was published in February, 1913. It is the book of Mr. Usher on "Pan-Germanism."

An equally mistaken view declares it the conception of an individual which chances to find for the moment a response in the German people, or a scheme which depends for its existence upon the transient personal influence of a few men. No doubt, a few men only know the full details of the plans for the realization of this stupendous enterprise, but the whole Nation is none the less fired by their spirit and is working as a unit in accordance with their directions. It is literally true that Germany has "become Bismarckian. His heavy spirit has settled upon it. It wears his scowl. It has adopted his brutality, as it has his greatness. It has taken his criterion of truth, which is Germanic; his indifference to justice, which is savage; his conception of a State, which is sublime." "This nation has forgotten God in its exaltation of the Germanic race."

I now call the Senate's attention to this particular quotation:

Mr. Hurd quotes the following sentences from the speech of the Imperial Chancellor in the Reichstag on November 10, 1912:

"For months past we have been living, and we are living now, in an atmosphere of passion such as we have perhaps never before experienced in Germany. At the root of this feeling is the determination of Germany to make its strength and capability prevail in the world."

Mr. President, this is the feeling and the sentiment that is shared in by the German people, and any secret negotiations between the Imperial German Government and the Government of Austria were no surprise, no disappointment to the German people after the long system of training and education from the time of the Franco-Prussian War down to the days of 1914, when this terrible war was begun. So I think, Mr. President, too much stress has been laid upon the proposition that people have been wronged by the secret negotiations of those who represent them or that they have suffered because of their ignorance of the secret negotiations. We may grant indeed that the German people have been wronged, but in the estimation and belief of the people themselves they were not wronged. They were ready and prepared for the war which followed.

I recall the colloquy that occurred when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was delivering his most able and interesting speech the other day, between himself and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. It referred to the Jay treaty of 1794. The inference to be drawn from the colloquy was that had the people known that such a treaty would have been negotiated they would have rebelled against it. But, Mr. President, the various subjects which brought about the negotiation of the treaty were well known to the people of the United States at that time.

The impressment of American seamen; the paper blockades; their refusal to pay for negroes taken from New York City at the time of the evacuation in 1783; the delimitation of the northeastern boundary—all these and others were questions that were to be discussed by the negotiators of the Jay treaty.

But there was a party in the United States at that time, Mr. President—the then Republican Party—which hoped that the negotiations would fail and that, as the result of the failure of the negotiations, there would be war between this country and England. Love of France on the part of the Republicans of that day and hatred by them of England engendered that feeling in regard to the treaty. That is what they desired to bring about—not that the negotiations were secret; not that the subjects of conroversy were not known to the people of the United States, but the inference was drawn, I think, from the debate and the colloquy that because of secrecy in regard to the subject matter an altogether different result was effected than would have been had—the negotiation and the terms of the treaty had all been known to the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I see no reason why, when we come to reverse this rule, to put it the other way, requiring a session which considers a treaty to be an open executive session, a majority of the Senate should not decide and render judgment as to whether or not the session should be a secret session. Otherwise, it looks as though we were afraid to trust ourselves; as if we were afraid to trust the good sense and judgment and discretion of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in regard to the resolution itself. A few weeks ago the Senate had before it a very important bill, which brought out a great deal of discussion. Not only here in the Senate was it discussed vigorously, but in the Committee on the Judiciary as well—the so-called Overman bill—granting such vast and comprehensive powers to the President of the United States. I have sometimes thought that we did not all appreciate the tremendous powers there conferred. It might be said that it is well enough to let bygones be bygones, and not to have anything to say about that bill at the present time, but from what I have heard on the floor, from time to time in the discussion of this resolution, there must be some significant relation between that bill and this resolution. In that bill we conferred upon the President the power to redistribute all of the functions and powers of the several executive departments of the Government. What can be done under it? By the very terms of the bill the President can go to the Secretary of the Treasury and say, "It is my desire now to transfer all of the functions and powers of this great Department of the Treasury, which has existed from the beginning of the Government down to the present time and carried on the business of the Government, to the Department of War, to the Department of Labor, to the Department of the Interior," or to any other department. That is the power which is granted under the very terms of the bill. No compromise or amendment would be tolerated at all.

It was thought that all the President desired might be easily accomplished by a bill not granting such comprehensive powers—such awful powers, I may say—as the Overman bill grants, but no amendment received any favor here upon the floor. Mr. President, the only shield between that power upon the part of the President and its exercise is the good sense of the Prseident—the power is there—in understanding and appreciating the will of the people of this great country. They would not tolerate the exercise of the power, and we rely on the good judgment of the President himself to see that it is not exercised to the extent granted. He will see there is no need. The amazing thing is that nothing less than the full grant of power made would satisfy.

What bearing has this upon the present discussion? It has just this bearing, Mr. President: It has been stated so many times on this floor that I have come to believe it must be true, although loath to believe it, that it is an administration measure; that the administration is behind this resolution, which provides that debate shall be limited to one hour on the main question and to 20 minutes on each amendment.

What does this signify? It seems to me that the two together, if they do emanate from the source mentioned, are the greatest manifestations of the aggression of executive power known in our history—something that we could not have dreamed of, say, two years ago, or before we entered this war. We could not have dreamed then that it was possible. Now, the proposition is to limit debate to one hour in this body. The rule has been until the recent cloture rule was passed—a very reasonable and liberal rule—unlimited debate.

I glance back over our war legislation from the 2d day of April, 1917, when the President appeared before the two Houses and delivered that splendid message, and I venture to say that no parliamentary body, no legislative body, in the history of the world has a record like that of the Congress of the United States in passing great, numerous, and far-reaching war legislation. They have done it with a promptitude, too, unexcelled in legislative annals; and yet, when there is no occasion for it and no necessity for it, this new revolutionary plan in Senate procedure is proposed for our adoption.

Mr. President, it is interesting sometimes to know how different situations and different environments provoke different sentiments. I quote from the book entitled "Congressional Government," by Woodrow Wilson:

Of course, however, there is less temptation to such speech making in the Senate than in the House—

The Senator from Massachusetts this morning quoted from another part of this book; I quote from that part relating particularly to the Senate—

The House knows the terrible possibilities of this sort in store for it, whether to give perfect freedom of debate to its 325 members—in these days when frequent mails and tireless tongues of telegraphy bring every constituency within easy earshot of Washington; and it therefore seeks to confine what little discussion it indulges in to the few committee men specially in charge of the business of each moment. But the Senate is small and of settled habits, and has no such bugbear to trouble it. It can afford to do without any cloture or previous question. No Senator is likely to want to speak on all the topics of the session, or to prepare more speeches than can conveniently be spoken before adjournment is imperatively at hand. The House can be counted upon to waste enough time to leave some leisure to the Upper Chamber.

Further:

Still, though not much heeded, the debates of the Senate are of great value in scrutinizing and sifting matters which come up from the House. The Senate's opportunities for open and unrestricted discussion, and its simple, comparatively unincumbered forms of procedure, unquestionably enable it to fulfill with very considerable success its high functions as a Chamber of revision.

The author of this book, in commenting upon an attempt once made to change the rules, in a footnote says as follows:

An attempt was once made to bring the previous question into the practices of the Senate, but it failed of success, and so that imperative form of cutting off all further discussion has fortunately never found a place there.

The whole discussion of the author, Mr. President, reflects a belief and a confidence in the principle of unlimited debate here in the Senate and the good that results from that unlimited debate.

Why, Mr. President, how will the chairman of a committee, having a great revenue bill in charge or a tariff bill or other tax bill, such as will be proposed here at this session, complete his presentation of the subject in an hour or even in an hour and a half? The chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SIMMONS] sits here in the Senate Chamber now. How could he have presented the last war-revenue bill in one hour, subject, as the chairman of that committee is, and as the chairman of any committee presenting a less important bill than a revenue bill or a tax bill is, to frequent interruption and to colloquies that stimulate thought and bring out the facts and that information which enables Senators to discuss and vote intelligently upon these vital questions? It is impossible, Mr. President.

A Senator may rise in his seat to take part in the discussion, and he be interrupted to such an extent that he can not finish his discussion in an hour or in an hour and a half, because he is not permitted to continue consecutively, and he needs two and mayhap three hours, but all the time the discussion proceeds in this interesting and wholesome way, the Senate is getting information, and the Members are deciding in their minds as to how they shall vote when the proposition is finally submitted by the Chair.

Mr. President, it seems to me that now, when it is shown that during the war we have transacted business with extraordinary dispatch and made the record we have, there can be no necessity for a rule of this kind, and I hope it will not prevail.

How long and how often shall we be presented with these questions, these issues, that demand a surrender of long-cherished rights and privileges? First, the Overman bill authorized the President to undo what Congress has been doing for 130 years; and, as I have said, the only protection is his good sense in doing what is for the public good and his appreciation of what would be the will of the people in that respect; and now comes this resolution.

Mr. President, if this resolution was submitted as a matter of unanimous agreement, if Senators were asked to consent to it and to join in harmony to meet a believed-to-be emergency, I would not hesitate for one moment in saying "Yes; let us consent that no Senator shall occupy more than one hour in debate." I would agree to that if I thought that there was any emergency whatever that required it, and I would forego and waive some of my beliefs in regard to what might constitute an emergency in order to bring that about; but, Mr. President, to have this resolution brought here with the assertion that the administration is for it and is insistent on its being passed in the face of the record this Senate has made stirs me to revolt. I can not support such a proposition.

Oh, Mr. President, it is urged again and again that all these things are necessary for the winning of the war. No one wants to win this war more than I myself do. As I had occasion to say once before, when the last German soldier is back on original German soil and Europe is freed from the scourge of the Hun, when the representatives of the allied powers are free to sit down at the peace council table and dictate the terms of a righteous, just, honorable, and lasting peace, and not until then should the war cease; until then there will be war for victory for the allies, for ourselves, and for the cause of freedom the world over.

Mr. President, American boys are there now doing their brave part on the western front. By their behavior and their gallantry at Cantigny, the Marne, and other points where the fighting is desperate, they have given hope and courage to our allies, and they have given deep anxiety to our enemies. We will win the war; there is no doubt about that; but, Mr. President, when these boys come marching home, I want that they should come back to what is still the land of the free, and, as they look upon the record made by Congress in its war legislation, I want it to be a record which shows no surrender and no destruction of any of the old familiar landmarks of liberty.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I regret that I have not been able to hear the debate upon the pending resolution, although I have followed it with sufficient closeness to have reached and formed a conclusion in opposition to its adoption. I particularly regret that I was not present to hear the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] present his views upon the amendment which he has offered to the resolution, because it seems to me that that amendment loses sight of the true nature of a treaty and the process through which it must pass before it becomes a contract between nations.

The amendment, stated in a sentence, is that all treaties shall be considered and acted upon in open session. I believe I quote the exact language of the amendment, except there is a provision that treaties may be considered behind closed doors if so ordered by a four-fifths vote of the Senate.

I have not the slightest objection to acting upon a treaty in open session, but, to my mind, at least, there is a difference between making the result of negotiations public—that is, making a treaty public—and making the negotiations themselves public; and it must be remembered, Mr. President, that the Senate of the United States performs functions of negotiation in connection with a treaty. A treaty may not inaptly be described as having these several stages: First come the pourparlers, or the conversations between the representatives of the different governments. Then come the actual negotiations, in which the governments undertake to formulate the views that they entertain upon the subject negotiated about. Then comes finally the drafting of the treaty and then comes the signing of the treaty. Then comes almost the last act in the negotiation or making of the treaty, and that is the ratification of the treaty, which in this country must be done by the Senate of the United States; in other countries by the king, or the emperor, or whoever may be in supreme executive authority. Then comes the exchange of ratifications, and the treaty does not become a contract or agreement between the powers until these ratifications are exchanged.

During the earlier processes, a treaty being but a contract between nations, nations proceed as individuals do, each seeking to obtain for his own country the greatest advantage that is possible in conscience in relation to the transaction. After the State Department in the United States has completed its negotiations with a foreign power, and after those negotiations have been reduced to a draft treaty, they are then sent, after signature, to the Senate of the United States, and then the negotiations may be reopened, because this body has the power to amend, and the power to amend means only this: The Senate has the power to present a different or a modified proposition, not acting upon or being satisfied with the proposition as it receives it from the hands of the State Department.

Mr. President, for us to sit here in solemn session when we are negotiating a treaty with Great Britain or any other country and say that we could have obtained better terms; that we should have this or that additional condition written in the treaty because individual Senators who may advocate such propositions may have within their personal knowledge reasons for thinking that those additions can be made to the treaty; to have a man who asserts that the particular country with which we are negotiating will do more, say, so openly, so that Great Britain may be just as well informed as the Members of the Senate as to what the discussion is about, seems to me as impractical as though the board of directors of a corporation should hold a meeting in a town lot while they were discussing a contract that they were proposing to make with another corporation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator regard the Senate of the United States, acting as the representatives of the people, in the same light that he does a board of directors representing stockholders?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I regard the question as wholly immaterial to anything that I have suggested and hardly worthy of a reply. That was only used as an illustration, to show that there is a distinction between negotiation and the pronouncement of the result of negotiation. As I said when I opened my remarks, I am just as much in favor as the Senator from Idaho himself of making every treaty public, so that there shall be no such thing as secret diplomacy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I assumed the Senator from Pennsylvania to use the illustration of the relationship of the board of directors to the stockholders for some purpose.

Mr. KNOX. I used the illustration in these words: I said that it seems as impractical for us to openly propose and discuss modifications that we desire to have inserted in a treaty as it would be for the board of directors of a corporation to publicly discuss the terms upon which it wished to agree with its adversary.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator must consider that there is some relationship in the way of illustration between the Senate of the United States, representing the people, and the board of directors, representing the stockholders.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to let the Senator from Idaho draw any conclusion or take any comfort from such statements as he may think I have made.

Mr. BORAH. I assure the Senator that I was not seeking to draw an embarrassing conclusion, but I wondered where the simile came in and just what purpose it served in the argument.

Mr. KNOX. I have no purpose except to try to make known to the Senate the distinctions that I draw in my own mind between the processes of negotiation and the publication of the results of negotiation; and I am perfectly frank to say to the Senator from Idaho that if he would insert in his amendment an exception in the case where amendments to treaties were being proposed, I would be entirely willing to vote for his amendment. So that all I desire to protect is the Senate as a negotiating power, because I contend that any body or any individual that sustains such a relation to a contract as that he may introduce new elements into the contract is part of the negotiating power. For this reason, unless the Senator from Idaho would be willing to make the exception, I feel that it is a very injudicious thing to do.

On the other hand, Mr. President, what is the reason for this rule at the present time? The Senate at any time, by a vote, may declare that any specific treaty shall be discussed in the open. Therefore, the Senate holds in its hands at all times the power to make even the negotiating period open, so that the public may have the benefit of the discussion of proposed amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to add a word to what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has said, and to call attention to some of the safeguards that have been thrown around the making of treaties that I believe have not yet been mentioned.

First, so far as I know, this is the only great country in the world which requires two official authorities to participate in the making of a treaty. Our Constitution provides that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall make these treaties; and, so far as I know, this is the only country which provides that safeguard. Then, in the second place, the Constitution provides that every such treaty brought into the Senate can not be ratified until it receives a two-thirds vote of the Senators present and voting. The rules of the Senate go further, and provide as follows:

> When a treaty shall be laid before the Senate for ratification it shall be read a first time, and no motion in respect to it shall be in order, except to refer it to a committee, to print it in confidence for the use of the Senate, to remove the injunction of secrecy, or to consider it in open executive session.
> When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration.

And still other safeguards follow.

In view of the fact that our forefathers carefully considered the danger of hastily entering into treaties which would bind the country and be, in fact, law, and made the safeguard of providing that the Senate must consent and advise in the making of a treaty, and this consent and advice of the Senate must be by a two-thirds vote, it seems to me we ought to be able to consider that sufficient safeguards have been thrown around treaty making.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has strangely mixed up in this debate the allegation of the evils of secret diplomacy as they afflict the countries of the Old World, where treaties are not only made in secret but where they are kept in secret, with the condition in the United States, which is not parallel in any respect whatever. This country has never suffered from secret diplomacy. The Senate on a number of occasions since I have been a Member of it, has decided to debate treaties in public; and, as a rule, I have been in favor of any motion to debate a treaty in public where no public injury could arise from such debate. Under the present rule the Senate possesses the power to do this thing. Why, then, bind ourselves, as proposed by the Senator from Idaho, by a rule under which 32 Members of the Senate could compel a treaty to be debated in public, even though a majority felt that the interests of the country required it to be first considered in secret session? Can we not trust the Senate of the United States? Has it come to this: That the Senator from Idaho is afraid to leave to a majority vote of the Senate the decision of the question whether a treaty already negotiated by the President, already referred to the Senate, already passed upon by a committee of the Senate, is a proper treaty to be considered in open or in executive session? Must we bind and shackle the Senate so that a majority can not decide what it considers best?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am rather surprised to hear the Senator from Nebraska talk about shackling the Senate, when that is what this controversy is about. That is the purpose of the resolution which comes from that side of the Chamber. It is not to permit the Senate to indulge in its discretion with reference to the presentation of questions, but to put upon us a limit which will preclude that very thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to interrupt him for a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The suggestion I desire to make is that the original rule tends to give latitude to the Senate, although it may limit the power of a particular Member. The amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho seeks to control the power of a majority of the Senate, which is the Senate itself, and does give latitude to the minority. The two propositions are entirely different.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator's resolution should be adopted, it would take unanimous consent for any Senator to express himself more than 20 minutes upon an amendment, although that might be an amendment such as the amendment to the last revenue bill, which is really the vital question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator was not here this morning when I stated that, representing those members of the committee who reported the resolution, I was prepared to agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa allowing a majority of the Senate at any time to extend the time.

Mr. BORAH. I am aware that the Senator from Iowa has an amendment on that subject, and I hope it will be adopted. I was speaking of the resolution as it now exists.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that the Senator from Iowa and myself and other members of the Committee on Rules who are in favor of this resolution have conferred about the matter, and we are agreed on that point; so that I did not want the Senator to be misled in his argument by thinking that it would require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; but, Mr. President, fundamentally it is the same proposition with reference to putting some kind of a limitation upon the Senate. I think I have as much confidence in the Senate of the United States as any other Member here, and I am sure that I hold my colleagues in quite as high esteem as any other Member; but in my judgment that question is not presented by the proposition which I am now urging.

I believe in publicity with reference to these negotiations and with reference to the consummation of the negotiations, which is in the form of a treaty. I think it just as essential to have publicity in regard to those matters as it is to have publicity in regard to any other matter with which the Senate of the United States is dealing. I am unable to see any distinction, except the distinction in favor of the position which I take, if any at all, between the presentation here of a revenue bill which we discuss in the open and a treaty proposition which may involve vastly more to the people of the United States than any revenue bill could possibly involve.

I know that coming down from long-past ages is this suggestion of the delicacy of the negotiations, and seeking to get all the advantage you can of the negotiators, and that you can do it better in the dark than you can in the light, and so forth. But, Mr. President, experience has shown that while there are inconveniences and perhaps evils of a minor nature associated with an open negotiation, the inconveniences and the evils which result from a secret negotiation are infinitely more, and we as men must, in legislating and weighing measures, weigh the good against the bad and undertake to discriminate as to where the greatest evil lies, and in my judgment it lies upon the side of secrecy.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has called attention to the fact that it takes a two-thirds vote to ratify a treaty; that it must lie over a certain time; that it comes from the President to this body for consideration, and he has narrated the different steps which are necessary to the complete negotiation of the treaty, just as the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has done.

But, Mr. President, that has very little bearing upon the proposition which I am urging, because none of those steps are in the open. Even if you were not permitted to pass upon the treaty for a month, and even if it took four-fifths instead of two-thirds, yet every single step, from the first negotiation to the final consummation, may be in absolute secrecy. That which interests and concerns the American people, which may involve their nationality, which may involve them in war, is not known to them nor permitted to be known to them until we see fit to release it to them; and that is after they are bound, after the people have been practically precluded from passing judgment upon the matter. I repeat it is a piece of grim humor to say that after the contract is made and effective and binding upon the Nation, then you may release it to the consideration of the people, and that they may have judgment in regard to it after they are powerless to effect any change.

Mr. President, I know it is said that the United States will not suffer from secret diplomacy—and when I say "secret diplomacy," I include all those steps from the first negotiation until it finally becomes a binding contract—because no treaty is binding until we pass upon it. That may be true. Let us consider, in the first place, the moral effect of this in countries where it is of vital moment. There is not a particle of doubt but that this war being waged now was effectuated through and by means of the combinations and machinations which were put up in secret. It could never have ripened into so perfect a conspiracy had it had to ripen in the open light of day. The combinations which the Kaiser has been making, especially from 1904 until this hour, until the latest enunciations of his activities, show how much he regards of worth to him the power to negotiate in secret.

Why, Mr. President, if the secret treaty which the Kaiser made with Russia on the 24th of July, 1905, had been exposed to the world at that time it would have been of tremendous effect in preventing the final consummation of the great affair in which we are now engaged. Why was it when the Czar and the Kaiser met in 1905 and pledged themselves to secrecy, cut out their foreign ministers, precluded anybody—witnesses or stenographers or anyone else—from being present, and entered into that combination which resulted in a treaty between the Czar and the Kaiser? Why did they keep it from their own people? They knew the effect that public discussion would have upon the transaction, and they knew the beneficial effect of keeping it absolutely secret from them, and they did so.

When we know that every boy who leaves his home and goes to a foreign clime to sacrifice his limb and life in this controversy is to some extent a victim of secret diplomacy, do we want to take a stand in favor of such a proposition or will the Republic of the United States throw its moral influence and its moral power upon the side of breaking down a system which, though it operates principally in Europe, finally results in pulling the United States into this controversy?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that any such evils as have come from secret diplomacy in Europe could have come if the treaties by European countries had been made and published as they are in the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I think so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has not the vice of the European secret treaty been the fact that it was made in secret and remained secret and was not known to the people?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I said the other day, there are undoubtedly some advantages to be had from publishing the treaty after it has been made; but let me ask the Senator what advantage can come to the people of the United States from exposing a treaty after it is made unless you assume that you are going to have the entire controversy reopened, and that the treaty which you have solemnly entered into is going to be abrogated through another power in the Nation than that which made it, the people? If the people are to effectuate anything in an orderly and proper way they must be let in on the facts and the conditions of the treaty in the making.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can answer the Senator's question. It is not reasonable to suppose that a Senate, knowing that as soon as it puts its stamp of approval upon a treaty it will be made public, will enter into a treaty which the country will not accept. The very fact that the Senate knows that it is to be made public, that it is to be submitted to the test of public opinion for criticism, would restrain any Senator, if it were necessary, from entering into a treaty which would not be proper.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I suggest that this thought ought to be taken into consideration: That although it takes two-thirds of the Senate to ratify a treaty, if the people do not like the treaty the very next day a majority of the House and a majority of the Senate can abrogate the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but does the Senator from Pennsylvania think that it is an orderly procedure or a logical procedure to first conclude a matter in secrecy and then submit it to those who openly may review the action of the Senate and perhaps offend a foreign nation by abrogating the treaty after it has already been considered by the treaty-making power. The Senator says that the effect is to deny any consideration upon the part of the public at all.

Mr. KNOX. My answer to that is that if I advocated openness of negotiation, I would begin at the fountainhead, and have the Secretary of State and the foreign ambassador negotiate in the open, so that we might have the advantage of it all along the line before it became crystallized into the form of a contract.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania answer my question? Does he think it wise or logical for the Government, first, to conclude a treaty and then to submit it, with the view that it may be abrogated if the people do not think it is wise?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly not; and no such treaty would be ratified with that view. I was simply trying to answer the hypothesis of the Senator from Idaho that under the present plan some dreadful treaty might be put over on the American people, of which they could not rid themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, suppose the treaty should be ratified on the 3d day of March, and Congress the next day went into vacation until the following December: Then the plan of the Senator from Pennsylvania would hardly work out.

Mr. KNOX. I can not anticipate that the Senate of the United States would, on the 3d day of March, ratify a treaty that would result in such criticism that the country would suffer between that time and the assembling of Congress in December.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps not; but I think, in view of the experience of the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself, that treaties have been ratified on the morning of the 4th of March, between the hour of assembling and the adjournment sine die. I think the Senator recalls one very vividly. I have no doubt he does. I do, because I had part in it.

Mr. KNOX. That is very true, Mr. President; but I have never known of any such treaty placing such a burden upon the people of the United States that they wanted it abrogated between that time and the next December.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not suggesting to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if I may be permitted, that the Senate would do anything that was unpatriotic or unwise; but it could not have the machinery of reconsidering a bad move in the course of nine months if it happened to ratify the treaty at the end of the session.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it certainly would be a most illogical course of procedure—it does not make any difference whether it happened on the 3d or the 4th of March, or at any other time—to have a review board in the nature of a popular demonstration against a treaty after it had been negotiated and completed by the Government. If the people of the United States are to be consulted at all, if the public opinion of the United States is to have any effect, or if these measures are to be passed upon in any way, shape, or form by anyone other than the Government agents, it ought to be at a time when, in an orderly way, the effect of it could be had in the completion of the treaty or in the consummation of the treaty.

I do not agree with the proposition that the United States has not put over any treaties which are not for the benefit of the people of the United States. I think treaties have been ratified here in secret session which never would have stood the test of public opinion, and I think they have been most unfortunate, and calculated to embroil this country in the future; and, while it is not necessary to go into a discussion of them at this time, it is by reason of some of these treaties that I have been interested in the question of publicity of treaties before their consummation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to call attention to what is known as the Rush-Bagot treaty, where a simple exchange of notes has bound our Government for more than 50 years to a line of policy which has been inimical to the interests of all of the States bordering upon the Great Lakes. I recall very distinctly that in the administration of Mr. Cleveland shipbuilders on Lake Michigan undertook to bid on gunboats that the Government was then needing, and Mr. Cleveland set the bid aside, because he said that in the exchange of notes between Mr. Rush and Mr. Bagot it was not possible for them even to consider a bid to build any character of warship on the Great Lakes, although we had the iron, and we had the timber, and we had the labor.

While the great cities of Detroit and Chicago and Cleveland were not then in existence, yet that inhibition has rested upon the officers of the United States from that moment to this; and Mr. Lincoln once considered the idea of abrogating that treaty under the power to give six months' notice, but it was not done. The notice was given but the treaty was never abrogated; and I say that occasionally great harm does come from a loose ratification of treaties.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, we are all going to concede that the Senate of the United States is a conscientious body and discharges its duties in accordance with what it thinks is right and proper. That is a rule which applies with reference to all other procedures, so far as that is concerned. Distrust or want of confidence in the Senate of the United States really has nothing to do with this matter, because of the fact that you might just as well close the door with reference to our legislation and say that you can trust the Senate of the United States to do the proper thing, and that if the people do not like it they can reverse it at the next election.

The point is this, that here is a matter of public concern. It is a matter of tremendous moment to those whom we represent, and there is no possible reason, it seems to me, why they should not be informed of the different subjects which lead to the consummation of the contract by which they are bound. We are here only for a short time. We are passing in and out of the Chamber very rapidly. The contract which we make binds the people of the entire United States, and the people are here all the time. There is no change of situation until the treaty is abrogated through some act on the part of their representatives, and there is no more reason to argue for secrecy with reference to that treaty than there is with reference to many other subjects which no one would contend ought to be considered in secret.

The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests that certain steps in negotiations must necessarily be secret. We have nothing to do with that. In this particular instance all I am asking for is a rule which will require the consideration of that contract which is finally to become binding in public before it is made binding. If some particular step is necessary upon the part of the Secretary of State, or some particular feature of the transaction is to be had in secret, and he so determines the matter, that is a thing which is not touched by this proposed rule at all, but after the matter has been shaped and crystallized and formed so that it becomes a binding contract if ratified I say the consideration of it should be in the open and before those who must be bound by it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator this question? Is that finally consummated until all the amendments have been agreed to? I quite agree with the Senator that when a contract—to use the Senator's own language as nearly as I can—is consummated and it is proposed to act upon it the people of the United States should have the opportunity to know what the contract is, but suppose we are considering a treaty here to-day in executive session. As it comes from the executive department, the Senator from Idaho is not satisfied with it. He thinks it does not do justice to our country, that we are proposing to do more or asking for less than under the circumstances we should do, and then he proposes to give the reasons and to fortify them with the information he may have on the subject. I think it would be extremely harmful, that being a process of the negotiation, to make that public.

That is the reason why I suggested in my observation a few moments ago that I would be perfectly content to vote for this amendment if you would make the exceptions that when a proposed amendment to the treaty was under consideration it should not apply, but when all the amendments have been disposed of to open the doors and discuss the treaty as long as you please, and let the public have the fullest information.

Mr. BORAH. That would necessarily expose all the different steps in the procedure within the Senate if the discussion once began. In other words, if the treaty is formed into a final instrument and the doors are thrown open and you begin discussion, you will not confine yourself in all probability to the form in which it has taken shape. You will undoubtedly review the different reasons for the different parts of the treaty and why they were inserted, and the facts upon which the different amendments were based. I do not see that we could get anywhere as a practical proposition. But I should like to ask the Senator now, as he is very familiar with the diplomatic history of this country, what treaty since 1794 has ever been negotiated by the United States that it would have been ill advised for the people to have been informed as to the contents as the negotiations proceeded?

Mr. KNOX. Of course, I am not familiar with the negotiations of any treaties except those that I negotiated myself, but I can imagine cases and I know of treaties—I am not at liberty to state the instances—in which if the process of negotiation and the propositions, counter propositions, modifications, and amendments that were made from time to time had been discussed in the open I do not think any conclusion would have been reached.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks in general terms. I do not know what particular treaty nor do I know what particular facts are in his mind, but I can not recall any treaty or the history connected with any treaty in which the United States would have suffered by reason of a public discussion of the treaty. I can recall treaties in which, in my judgment, the United States would have been greatly benefited by a public discussion of the treaty.

We are not supposed to have very many secrets as between ourselves and those whom we represent with reference to those matters in which they are interested.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if the negotiations which did not result in a final treaty between Colombia and the United States had been made public the last treaty which was submitted to the Senate would never have been made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when we make a treaty here, if any provision of that treaty is violated and it becomes necessary to sustain it on the part of the United States, we call upon those to sustain it who have not had one word to say with reference to its formation. If we make a treaty of permanent alliance with some European powers when this war closes and close it up here in secret session and it leads to difficulties with other foreign powers, we are not called upon to sustain it; we have very little to do with it. We remain here and vote conscription laws and revenues and call upon the man out in the street and in the factory and on the farm to sustain it who were never consulted with reference to its terms.

Mr. KNOX. If I may be permitted a word, I do not like to take so much of the time of the Senator from Idaho, but he has missed my point. I am not interested in keeping the process of negotiation from the American people for any purpose except for the purpose of keeping it from the other Governments for the time being. The American people are bound to know the result of the treaty. Take the instance of this country when this war ends. There must be treaties of peace. A treaty of peace must be submitted to the Senate of the United States for its ratification or approval. Perhaps every Senator who will be here when those treaties come up for consideration will have his own notions about what the treaty should contain. Having those notions as to what concessions should be made by a particular power, as to what demands are made by some power are overdemands and what demands perhaps by other powers are underdemands, would it not be extremely harmful to have it go out that 30 or 40, half of the Senate, perhaps almost a majority of the Senate, had agreed with this power as to its demand and disagreed with the other power as to its demands, or had this or that particular notion as to how the adjustment should be made? Would it not be infinitely better to have this question settled here by ourselves and let us ascertain what our own mind is before we disclose that mind to the public?

Mr. BORAH. I differ with the Senator on the proposition. I believe that there is outside a tremendous mind which constitutes the public mind. I am of the opinion that it would be just as sane and wholesome a mind with reference to what that treaty should contain as that of the particular 96 men who happen to sit here. I think that those who have fought and made it possible to have a treaty of peace—that class of people who have sustained the burden that it may be consummated—are quite as capable of passing upon its saneness and equity and courtesy to other nations as the 96 men who sit here in the Senate. That is just the difference between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself.

Mr. KNOX. I beg the Senator's pardon. If the Senator from Idaho had listened to what I said I do not think he would have found it necessary to invoke that argument.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will admit this proposition, that if we consummate that treaty of peace there will come a time when the doors are thrown open and there is no remedy on the part of the people except an election and a change of the Senate. There must be a complete abrogation through other agents than those who consummate it, and when the other agents come here they sit down in secret and close another transaction. Now, the power of public opinion effectuates its result by operating upon the transaction at the time the transaction is being consummated, and not after it is closed. It can not do so effectively.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to suggest to the Senator also that if, for the sake of the argument, we assume the Senators who had debated it and considered it in secret were right in the conclusion they reach, would it not help to unite the country behind them by permitting the country to read and hear their arguments as they are made and listen to all the discussion that had taken place?

Mr. BORAH. I think, as I said the other day, that one of the great advantages is open discussion on this matter. The people are prepared either to reject it or with knowledge to approve of the relationship of their Nation to other countries as it has been consummated or arranged by treaty. The Senator from Pennsylvania knows that from the beginning of this war there was not a single people engaged in the war or going to be engaged in the war who had any knowledge whatever of the relation of themselves to the other nations of the earth concerning those transactions out of which the war grew. The people who were called upon to sustain the war had no knowledge whatever of the relationship of their own countries to the other countries with which they were about to engage in conflict or with whom they were about to ally. They were called upon to sustain a proposition concerning which they had no information whatever. That may be an effective kind of a government, but it is not a popular government. It is not a free government. A government which binds hand and foot and shackles the people to a contract, calls upon them to support it, and compels them to support it, without any knowledge whatever in its formation or without any knowledge even with reference to the facts which constitute the violation of the contract, is not a representative government.

It is not a democracy. It is precisely what the Czar and the Kaiser had—a personal Government; an autocratic Government; a Government which binds the people without their consent; which compels them to act without knowledge.

That is precisely what happens here when we make a treaty. We will assume, for the sake of the argument only, that we make a treaty which is an unfortunate treaty, which is an unwise treaty, yet the moment we put our ratification upon it and it is exchanged it is binding upon us, and perhaps nothing but war will relieve us from it.

Now, who has been consulted in regard to it? Has the democracy been consulted? Have the people who support the Government been consulted? No; their agents have bound them to a proposition which they must support, regardless of whether it is satisfactory to them, or they must be in a position where they are charged with repudiating the treaties of their Government.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. Would the Senator in all cases have published a treaty, assuming it was negotiated by representatives of different powers?

Mr. BORAH. I would.

Mr. STERLING. Might it not happen that the publication of a treaty as soon as it was negotiated, before ratification, would destroy the very purpose for which it was negotiated?

Mr. BORAH. I can not imagine how it would do so, unless there was, as has been the case so often, some crooked or sinister proposition tied up in the treaty. If it is a wise treaty, if it is founded in justice, there is no reason to assume that the American people are going to act other than in harmony with the motives of it.

Mr. STERLING. But a deprivation of the purposes of the treaty might result from the action taken by the other power which was a party to the treaty or negotiation. The practical phase suggests itself to my mind of our acquisition, for example, of insular possessions necessary for our national welfare, which another power might seek to acquire for the purpose of a naval base close to our shores. Would the Senator from Idaho say it was advisable that a treaty like that should be published as soon as it was negotiated with a foreign power, and thus let the power that was trying to acquire that possession know what we were doing and be able to circumvent the acquisition if possible?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, these real estate deals which go on between the different powers of the world are the most delicate subjects they have to deal with. I assume that when it comes to a common ordinary real estate deal, such as are constantly being made in secret, it is a very delicate subject. But you had better let the people know of it while it is going on than to let them know of it after it is made, as in the instance of Russia. When I hear Senators suggest that the people of the United States are incapable of acting wisely or courteously in regard to such matters I conclude that it is a soft impeachment of the capacity of the people for self-government.

I am assuming, Mr. President, that if the United States does its part in regard to this matter there will be a coming up to this proposition upon the part of all the nations of the earth with whom we shall have to deal. It will not be very safe for the United States to enter into any treaty at the close of this war with any power in Europe which is not subject to public inspection and consideration from the first step to the close. It will not be a basis of permanent peace if we undertake to enter into negotiations which the people themselves of all the countries interested could not approve. If you are going to have a permanent peace, you must have it based upon propositions which are entirely satisfactory to the people of the different nations of the earth. If you are simply going to have a patched-up peace, based upon some advantage here or there, or some balance of power which may be hatched up in the chanceries of Europe; if you are going to rely upon that kind of peace, you can undoubtedly get it better and quicker and more expeditiously by secret negotiations; but if you are going to have a permanent peace, a peace which satisfies the minds of the people of the different nations, if you are going to have a peace which brings contentment to those who are most concerned, you must have a peace based upon treaties with which they are entirely familiar from the first step to the close.

I venture to say that, while this resolution may be voted down to-day, as the war draws more nearly to a close and the great questions growing out of the war come more nearly to us for solution we will of our own motion see the impropriety and the injustice of imposing anything upon those who have fought and won the war with which they are not entirely familiar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, is it possible that we are ready to vote without any cloture, with no modification of the rules, and yet we are ready to vote on a proposition of such transcendent importance as this? I had been led to believe by Senators on the other side of the Chamber that it was impossible to get a prompt vote here under the rules as they now exist, and yet debate on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota has now been exhausted.

But, Mr. President, I want to say a word on the practical side of this question, and that is all I am going to say. We have 96 Senators here. Forty-four of them are Republicans and 52 of them are Democrats. Twenty-seven would be sufficient to conduct the Democratic caucus, and 14 would be a majority of that caucus. Yet we are going to pass the entire question of what legislation we should exact and the debate over to 14 members of the majority party; this is tyranny, not cloture.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not what we are about to vote on.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; it is not what we are about to vote upon, but it is the first step in that proceeding, and this vote on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will make the next vote easier, and it is to the main question that I desire to address the Senate.

This proposed rule is revolutionary and not in the interest of orderly procedure and in accordance with the faithful and intelligent conception of our duty to our States and the country, or I mistake the purpose of the founders of the Government and those who have served it faithfully up to this hour in this Chamber.

This proposed change in the rules will reestablish "King Caucus" in the Senate as it has never existed before. Senators may think they will get an hour on the main question and 20 minutes on each amendment, but it will rest with the Presiding Officer to determine whom he shall recognize to offer an amendment. Perhaps the day will go as this day has gone, every one being anxious to vote, as Senators are now anxious to vote; and yet the principle of unbridled conduct which we have cherished and maintained for a century upon both sides of the Chamber is to be superseded and wiped out by this amendment.

I have seen too much good come to the country from the power residing in the individual Senator to delay proceedings until the Senate's mind could be focused upon the importance of the controversy to yield willingly to this proposed innovation. There is no occasion for it. I say, for one, to the Senator from Alabama, that if he is urging this resolution in order to have a prompt vote on the revenue bill, I will sign a request now to bring the revenue bill to a prompt vote under the present rules of the Senate, and I dare say many Senators on this side of the Chamber will do likewise.

There is something else behind this. Senators do not willingly change their minds in regard to a power so valuable as is the power of unlimited discussion in the Senate, subject to the latest modification of our rules. I could recount innumerable instances where this latitude has been wholesome and helpful to an intelligent understanding of measures pending. The whole country, as I said on Saturday, when interrupting the Senator then having the floor, applauded the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Burton] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] in their filibuster against the river and harbor bill.

The press of the country thanked the Senate for maintaining the unlimited right of public discussion. I have seen it practiced over and over again to the advantage of the country. The force bill was beaten in this body because certain southern Senators would not subscribe to it and had the power through discussion alone to defeat it. If we were to seek to put an amendment on the revenue bill to fix the price of cotton, some of the Senators from the cotton States would regret very much having waived this power which now resides in the senatorial office to force a patient consideration of that question. If you limit the right of discussion here you will find that a few men, constituting a majority of the majority side, whether upon the other side of the Chamber or upon this side, will absolutely control the deliberations of this body.

I once had occasion to put into my pocket a treaty known as the fisheries treaty, negotiated and about to be ratified here, when I got my hands on it, and I discovered for the first time that the rights of my State, lying along the Canadian border, had not been properly respected. I kept it there until the majority of the Senate were informed and willing to be just to Michigan as well as Canada and the United States as a whole.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator if he secured the rights of his State by reason of the fact that he had the right of unlimited debate or because he had that treaty in his pocket?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, my pocket was not so capacious, but the power that I had, and which the Senate knew I had, helped me rewrite the treaty. This proposition will come back to plague every Senator in this Chamber. We are about to vote on an important matter. I do not believe there is a Senator in the Chamber who knows just how the vote is going to go, but we are about to vote upon it after a very brief discussion and without cloture—how amazing.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is not the Senator's statement tantamount to the assertion that any three or four men in the Senate, if they are not satisfied with the legislation which is favored by, say, four-fifths of this body, should have the right absolutely to nullify the will of the remainder of the body?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to answer the question, for it is a fair one. It comes from a Senator representing in part the State of Arizona, which fronts on the Mexican border. I want to say to the Senator from Arizona that if, in the ordinary processes of our relations to Mexico or other Governments, the State of Arizona should be discriminated against there is not a Senator in this Chamber who would take the floor more quickly than would the Senator from Arizona to defend his State, and our present rules would help him, and by the exercise of every right he has he could hold the floor until he could focus the attention of his colleagues upon the injustice sought to be done to his State.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is unquestionably true, and I thank my friend from Michigan for the compliment involved in his statement; I believe it is likewise true of every Senator on this floor; but that does not reach the question. If three-fourths or four-fifths or five-sixths of the Senators want to get results on proposed legislation, which they think is of more importance than the mere ground of my objection, shall I be clothed with the power, with three or four other Senators helping me, to nullify any proposed action of this body, when all other Senators are in favor of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, one moment. The Senator either has overlooked the present rule or he has not considered it. We can bring any pending question to a vote here when two-thirds of our membership desire to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator from Michigan refer to the last rule?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That has not yet been invoked.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. I have signed a petition to invoke that rule, as other Senators have done, once or twice when some great question was at issue, a question incident to war. I know that a petition was circulated around the Chamber in the small hours of the morning during one of our all-night vigils, and we signed it. I was rather reluctant to sign it, but I yielded to the wishes of my colleagues. There is a way to get a vote here speedily if earnestly desired.

I have never seen the public interest suffer by reason of the power of unlimited discussion residing in Senators. It is the one thing which distinguishes us from the House of Representatives, in which I served with my honored friend from Arizona for many years. I have seen great men in the House of Representatives beg for a moment's time and unable to get it; bills are debated here. I once saw the Senator from Alabama, who has charge of this resolution, turned out of the House of Representatives by caucus decree under practical cloture.

Almost every Senator when he becomes a Member of this body does so with the idea that he wants to get results and get home; but it is far more important to get the proper results than it is to get home.

I remember very well the legislation with reference to Porto Rico, and I remember the great Senator from Ohio, the late Senator Foraker, standing in his place and forcing the Senate to a correct attitude toward Porto Rico. I saw another great Senator from Ohio, the late Senator Hanna, make the longest speech in his life in this Chamber in order that he might influence public sentiment from the Nicaragua Canal to the Panama Canal, the House having passed the former bill hastily. Who is to say that that was not wise?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Apropos of the suggestion made a moment ago by the Senator in regard to the force bill, the Senator will remember that a number of years after that bill was defeated Senator Hoar publicly stated upon the floor of the Senate that if the bill had been forced to a vote under a cloture it would have passed by 15 majority; but, because of unlimited debate, the people of the United States became so aroused against it that it was defeated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Utah. The force bill was put through the House of Representatives under their cloture rule, by which Democrats were throttled, and now it is proposed to put the enactment of such a measure in the power of a bare majority of the Senate.

Why, what strange times have we come upon when it is proposed to delegate 14 Senators, constituting a quorum of a majority of the Democratic membership, the right to pass upon any program and bring it in here and put it through by the aid of cloture? I warn you on the other side that, if adopted, this new rule will come home to plague you. You hold your majority by a very slender tenure; you are at this moment deeply concerned whether you will have a majority after the November elections. I myself do not think you will have a majority; but why put in the hands of the majority, upon either side of the Chamber, the power to put through immature legislation which ought not to be passed? There is no occasion for this proposed new rule.

I wish to reecho what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] said this morning about the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. No one in this Chamber has a higher opinion of that Senator than I have. I served with him in the House of Representatives for many years; I served with him upon the Committee on Ways and Means of that body; I know the character of the man, his mind, and the inclinations of his heart; but he was turned out of the House of Representatives under cloture rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. What does the Senator mean by "turned out"?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I mean that a majority of the House of Representatives, acting under a cloture rule, scarcely giving him an opportunity to be heard, decided that he was not legally elected to the House, and he was deprived of his seat. I voted to put him out. I did not know him as well then as I do now or I would not have voted to do it. I do not think we made any special improvement by the change; but it only goes to show that when a fair-minded man like myself can be carried along by King Caucus and forced to do a thing that he would not with more deliberation be willing to do, that other men, like my friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], not so free from prejudice [laughter] are apt to proceed perhaps to even greater lengths under the guidance of a party caucus.

I do not know and can not understand what you are aiming at. You are not aiming at me, because I do not offend against the proprieties of the Senate. The longer I stay here the less I speak. Some of the best men who ever served in this body have grown to dislike verbal controversy. A man who sat right there [indicating] for 30 years, one of the best public speakers of his time, a great legislator, a statesman, and a parliamentarian, Mr. Frye, of Maine, scarcely ever spoke in the Senate in later years. Men get over the fascination of their own speech; but if the occasion should require or if some injustice was sought to be done, unlimited debate would be a very desirable and potential weapon to reside in the senatorship.

I have seen contests for seats in this body two or three times since I have been here. I will never forget the argument of the great Senator from Texas, Mr. Bailey, who, on constitutional grounds, made use of every privilege and power he possessed to save a State from being deprived of representation in the Senate. So much good has come of unlimited debate that I marvel that Senators can accept a change in that rule with so much indifference. It is not that a Senator wishes to be heard at great length; it is the power to defend his State, which you are attempting to curtail. No Senator in this body cares anything about the internal affairs of Michigan save the two Senators from that State, and when her rights are impinged, every power that goes with the senatorial office should be used to prevent the injustice. The full knowledge of this fact may come home to you in the near future. Take away the right of unlimited debate and you take away the one great distinguishing characteristic of senatorial procedure.

Let us not do this thing hastily and without proper consideration. I do not wish to keep Senators here against their will, although I have not half finished what I desire to say. I should like to recount a few incidents other than those I have mentioned where this power has worked to the advantage of the Government, and I defy any Senator on the other side of the Chamber to tell me a single instance where it has worked to the disadvantage of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], upon which the yeas and nays have been requested.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think we should first ascertain whether we have a quorum present.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, why not? Why do we want to vote so hurriedly? I should like to have a quorum, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, if it is agreeable to him, before he makes the request, that if we can have a vote on the so-called Sterling amendment to-night, my purpose after that is to move an executive session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is the case, I will withdraw my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. In his absence I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. WADSWORTH'S name was called). The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], but before he went away he told me he was opposed to the Borah amendment, and that I might vote on that; and I have no doubt that he would vote the same way that I have voted on the Sterling amendment. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] is unavoidably detained on business of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

Mr. GUION. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Beckham	Harding	Myers	Sterling
Brandegee	Hitchcock	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Pomerene	Swanson

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 10, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we come to Thee in all the simplicity and confidence of children dependent upon Thee for life and all that makes it worth living. We are weak, but Thou art mighty. Forsake us not in this hour of trial and distress.

Impart unto us, we beseech Thee, wisdom, strength, courage, sufficient unto our needs.

Let Thy blessing descend upon our soldiers and their allies now engaged in a terrific struggle for liberty and justice against a relentless foe who would crush liberty and make freemen subject to their will.

The dastardly acts which have followed in their wake are but warnings of what would follow in a victory to their arms.

Be with us, we pray Thee, to uphold, sustain, and guide us in all our undertakings in consonance with Thy will, and all praise shall be Thine, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 8, 1918, was read and approved.

MEN OF DRAFT AGE IN ARMY AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 390.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men (with the name and home address of each) who, on June 5, 1917, were between the ages of 21 and 31 years, and who since that date have been commissioned or enlisted either in the active or in any of the reserve forces of the Military or Naval Establishments and assigned to clerical work in their respective departments, or in offices elsewhere, where such service is not directly rendered to and as a part of units of the Army and Navy employed in active or field operations, and who have received deferred classification by reason of being already in the military or naval service of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. Upon the point which I raised the other day with reference to the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 7237). I spoke to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the committee, and he agreed with me that the references in the conference report are erroneous, and, of course, the report would be subject to a point of order. I desire to say I do not wish to press the point of order, but I wish to ask unanimous consent that without withdrawing the conference report the conferees be permitted to correct the erroneous references in the report, and have them referred to the engrossed bill with the Senate amendments, and that the report with the corrected references may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the conferees be permitted to make the references to the House engrossed copy——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the clerk making the report in the Senate made that incorrect reference. I think the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is altogether proper.

Mr. STAFFORD. Should not the report be withdrawn? Here is a report signed by the conferees; it contains references to a bill that is not the engrossed copy. Should not the conference report be withdrawn and have the report presented in regular order? When conferees agree to a report, that is their report. That is what the papers in the possession of the House show. Now, there ought to be unanimous consent asked to have the report withdrawn, and then the gentleman can present another report to conform with the engrossed copy.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, can the conferees act on this report as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts without having possession of the conference report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And without the concurrence of the Senate, too.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And without the concurrence of the Senate, too?

The SPEAKER. The right thing to do is to withdraw the report, and if some gentleman will make the motion the Chair will put it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill and refer it to the conferees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bills of the following titles, had agreed to the conferences asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. HOLLIS, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

H. R. 11658. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10924. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 9641. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 9506. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4005. An act providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in the State of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof; and

S. 4103. An act to consolidate certain forest lands within the Cache National Forest, Utah, and to add certain lands thereto.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representative to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4404) entitled "An act repealing the portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pp. 1015 1035) which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation in Montana."

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4108. An act to provide for the entry under bond of exhibits of arts, sciences, and industries; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

S. 4404. An act repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pp. 1015 and 1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation in Montana; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 4005. An act providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in the State of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4103. An act to consolidate certain forest lands within the Cache National Forest, Utah, and to add certain lands thereto; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 9959. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912;

H. R. 5558. An act to amend section 101 of the Judicial Code;

H. R. 7796. An act to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan; and

H. R. 9864. An act to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KETTNER. I ask unanimous consent to insert a letter from the Secretary of the Interior regarding homes for returning soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert a letter from the Secretary of the Interior concerning homes for returning soldiers. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, that is the letter that we all received, I assume. At least, I received a copy this morning. It contains some very interesting views from the Secretary of the Interior, and it is apparently intended to direct the attention of Congress to the situation existing and to the advisability of doing something. Now, I can not see any advantage in extending at length that letter in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. Every Member has it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman, the Secretary of the Interior having been absent from Washington and from the continent for some time, whether he has information as to whether the Secretary knows anything about this letter?

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I think the Secretary knows all about it, and I think it is so full of valuable information that people, especially in the Middle and Western States, would be very greatly interested in the letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter that I have written to accompany my speeches when they are sent out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter that he has written to accompany his speeches when he sends them out. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, is that not an unusual proceeding?

The SPEAKER. It is unusual; yes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that practice should not be established in this House.

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes. I want to read a letter from the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object—and I do not propose to object—I will ask my friend if he will kindly withhold that request until the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] can submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I will do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under the rules this is District day. Upon the request of the majority leader, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], I ask that the bill which was under consideration on Saturday be considered again to-day, and that to-morrow be District day instead of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to substitute to-morrow for to-day as District day. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, how about the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]? He has two bills which were made privileged, and which he anticipated would be taken up following the consideration of the rehabilitation bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It was understood that District day should intervene. That was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. This is District day, anyway.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he knows if his colleague, Mr. SHERLEY, will report the sundry civil bill to-day? It was my understanding last week that the sundry civil appropriation bill would be reported to-day and considered to-morrow. Has the gentleman any information as to that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. GARNER. If it is to be reported to-day, I think it should be considered first.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not ask that it be taken up after the sundry civil bill?

Mr. GARNER. I do not want to do that; but I do know that it is the purpose of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], expressed to me Saturday, that he believed the sundry civil bill would come in to-day, and that we would be able to pass it this week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I am acting under the request made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] on Saturday.

Mr. GARNER. Under that statement I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire whether this consent will interfere with the consideration of conference reports?

The SPEAKER. It leaves it exactly where it would have been if the request had never been made, and it leaves it in the discretion of the Chair to-morrow to recognize somebody to call up the appropriation bill even if this order is made. In its present form it is subject to the consideration of conference reports and appropriation bills and privileged matters.

Mr. GILLETT. I presume that to-morrow, if the House should prefer to take up the sundry civil bill or the business in order on District day, it could by a vote so determine.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. That is so. There is no question whatever about it. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

FIRST MISSISSIPPI CONFEDERATE COMPANY, AT ABERDEEN, MISS.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for two or three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. What about?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I made a speech the other day about Confederate soldiers tendering their services to the President, and I have a letter from the President of the United States I want to read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on May 14 last I discussed in a short speech in the House of Representatives the organization on May 3, 1918, of the First Mississippi Confederate Company at Aberdeen, Miss., composed of Confederate veterans, of which Mr. J. W. Howard was elected captain, and the passage by the members of the company unanimously of a resolution tendering their services to our great Commander in Chief, President Woodrow Wilson, to be used in winning the war. In accordance with their expressed request to me as their Representative in Congress I made formal tender to the President of their services by letter, inclosing the proceedings and the resolution, with the request that he make reply to Capt. J. W. Howard. On June 7 I received the following letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE.
Washington, June 7, 1918.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CANDLER: The President has been glad to comply with the request in your letter of June 6 and would be glad to have you forward the inclosed letter to Capt. Howard.

Thanking you for bringing the matter to our attention, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

The letter inclosed to me by his secretary, Mr. Tumulty, was signed by the President himself and is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE.
Washington, June 7, 1918.

Capt. J. W. HOWARD,
First Mississippi Confederate Company,
Aberdeen, Miss.

MY DEAR CAPT. HOWARD: I have learned with the most genuine appreciation of the action of the First Mississippi Confederate Company, of which Mr. Condie Tubb apprised the Hon. E. S. Candler in a letter dated May 11, and I want to beg that you will convey to the members of the company an expression of the pleasure their offer of services has given me. Such evidences of devotion and of willingness to make every sacrifice are in the highest degree delightful and encouraging, and you may be sure that if it should turn out at any time to be possible for the Government to avail itself of this offer it will not hesitate to do so.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

[Loud applause.]

I am very happy and I know Capt. Howard and every member of his magnificent company, composed of true, loyal, and brave men, will be delighted to receive this splendid response from President Wilson, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States of America. I am glad he said to them, "You may be sure that if it should turn out at any time to be possible for the Government to avail itself of this offer, it will not hesitate to do so." Capt. Howard and his company are honored in receiving this letter, but would feel more highly honored in receiving an official order assigning them to duty in the American Army, now fighting for the preservation of our liberties, the glory of our flag, and the perpetuity of this Republic. Yes; at this very moment fighting in the sacred cause for righteousness, truth, justice, and democracy, and for the destruction of oppression, brutality, barbarism, and autocracy, that civilization may survive and the Christian religion be supreme in the Nations of the world. If given the chance, these chivalrous and brave heroes composing this company would press forward with intrepid step and flashing eyes, beaming with loyalty and patriotism, beneath the Stars and Stripes, the most beautiful flag of the grandest Nation on earth, with their comrades in arms to a glorious victory which would secure democracy and universal peace. [Great applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, June 19, 1918.

Mr. BARNHART requests leave of absence for Gen. I. R. SHERWOOD, on account of advice of his physician that he go home and recuperate from injuries received in a street car accident in which he was injured.

HENRY A. BARNHART.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 4557.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 4557, with Mr. HELM in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 4557, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill [S. 4557] to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House rose on Saturday, the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] was pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see whether or not any gentleman, a member of the committee, desires to speak in favor of the Caraway amendment. I would like to make some arrangement, if possible, for closing debate on that proposition.

Mr TOWNER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is here. The gentleman might ask him.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS] desired to speak.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If any other gentleman desires to speak, I would like to make some arrangement with him. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on the Caraway amendment, which is now pending before the committee, be closed in 25 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know whether anybody desires to speak on this side or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that the debate on the Caraway amendment be closed in 25 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS].

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything in regard to this amendment, but since the opportunity has offered perhaps I had better accept the chance.

I am in favor of this bill. I believe that it is about the most important bill, from the humanitarian standpoint, that we have considered at this session. I am in favor also of the Caraway amendment, because I believe that those who are to administer upon this bill should not be too much restricted in its operation. It has been stated here that vocational training is a very narrow term, that it applies entirely to work with the hands or feet. I think that the gentlemen who are to administer this bill should not be so restricted. They should be permitted to rehabilitate these wounded soldiers to the status that they had formerly occupied as nearly as possible.

The Standard Dictionary states that rehabilitation is "to restore to former status, capacity, right, rank, or privilege." I have in mind the story of a young man as he related it to me the other day, who was a student of the law. He had spent some years in preparing himself to enter the profession of the law, when he was accidentally blinded by an electric shock which destroyed his eyesight entirely.

He felt like committing suicide. He was married, had a wife and one or two children. He consulted with his wife on the subject of going ahead with his studies in the law. She told him she would be his eyes, that she would help him all she could. He continued his study of the law, and since then through the profession of the law has made a competency for his wife and children and for himself, and has been elected a Member of this body. Now, suppose that injury had occurred while he was a soldier. Perhaps he would not have been fitted for working with his hands. He might not have wanted to go into the business of blacksmithing or farming or carpenter work; but instead of that he might have desired to go ahead with his studies in the law.

I think the rehabilitation board, who will undoubtedly be men of experience and good judgment, should be allowed to exercise some discretion in determining whether a young man who leaves the study of the law or medicine, dentistry or the ministry, goes to war, and is wounded and disabled shall be compelled to go into carpenter work, blacksmithing, or some other vocational occupation, or whether he may be allowed to continue his life work. The board may prescribe the course. Why too much restrict them?

I notice that in 1916 we appropriated $101,000 for the support of Howard University out here for the education of negroes.

They are not restricted to vocational work. They are permitted to take up dentistry, the law, or medicine, or theology, or engineering, or other polite professions. Are not the young men who have been wounded, and who are to be wounded, in this war as deserving of our attention as these negroes out at Howard University? I think a good work is done there. I should vote for an appropriation of that sort, but I do not believe we should too much restrict the work to be done under this bill, but that we should give to the people who are to administer it the right to say whether a man is best fitted to go into some learned profession rather than to go into something for which he is not fitted. Therefore I think this Caraway amendment ought to pass; that we ought to strike from this bill the word "vocational" and leave to the judgment of these men who are to administer this law full discretion in its operation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAYS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the definition that the gentleman has just read from the dictionary, "rehabilitation" means to restore to a former status. Does the gentleman think that would be contemplated by a proposition to educate a young man entirely along professional lines?

Mr. MAYS. I think perhaps not, but they ought to be permitted some discretion in the matter, and the point I am trying to make is that a boy who leaves in the midst of his professional studies ought to be allowed to complete them if he is disabled while fighting for his country. My two boys were studying law when they went into this war. They may be wounded. If they are, I myself shall undertake to educate them and continue them in the work of the law if they are able to pursue it, but some fathers may not be able to continue the boys in the line they have chosen and for which they seem best fitted. Therefore discretion should be given this board who are to administer this law as to whether or not a man shall be restricted to hand work or bodily labor, although he may be better fitted for theology or the law or medicine or something of that character. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I understand how gentlemen taking up the abstract proposition whether a man ought not to have a chance of going to a professional school when he returned from the war would find that proposition appealing to them. I understand how generally that would receive an affirmative response in the mind of every generous and patriotic citizen. But we should understand, gentlemen, that that is not the object and purpose of this bill. It does not propose to give men a general education or to cover every possible case or condition. It was not organized, formulated, or initiated for that purpose. Let me say, gentlemen—and I desire to say this especially to gentlemen on the other side of the aisle—that this is preeminently a war measure and an administration measure. It is a war measure because of the fact that the wounded soldiers are returning from France on every available transport. Already over 4,000 of our boys, soldiers of the Union, have been wounded on the battle fields of France. Many of them have been able to go back again into the ranks. Many of them have been sent here entirely incapacitated to return. Almost any day we may expect them to come in, not by units, or by tens, or by hundreds, but by thousands. If 200,000 of our boys shall be engaged, as is not at all unlikely, as is indeed very probable, in a great offensive or counteroffensive that may come at any time, it is not at all unlikely that 10,000 of them will be sent back here wounded and disabled. So this is imperative legislation. Some of these boys are here now. They demand attention at our hands. We are doing what we can for their physical and mental restoration. We have them now under treatment in the hospitals, and as an incident of their mental and physical restoration they are to some extent now being given, without authority, a little vocational training. But the experience of this war has demonstrated the fact that it is a great, a serious, an imperative responsibility on the Nation to provide for these returned soldiers just as soon as possible to give them such training as will restore them both functionally and vocationally, give them such training as they may need to make them independent and self-respecting citizens of the community. So all the nations engaged in the war—the allies and their enemies—are taking up this vocational educational proposition.

I will say to gentlemen that none of these nations has considered the question of educating men professionally. Over here it was discussed for a while, but it was soon ascertained that it was entirely unnecessary; that it would complicate matters; that vocational education was a separate proposition; that professional education was one thing and vocational education was another. Professional education is open to any returned soldier to-day without cost to him. Every college in the United States opens its doors without cost to the soldiers. We are now giving every disabled man, and this treats only of disabled men, an amount that may help him while engaged in studies in the schools, if he desires to pursue such course.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. MAYS. Is it true that the schools are offering to educate soldiers free?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; everywhere. I will venture to say to the gentleman that he can not find a law school or a medical school in the United States to-day that does not do that. I do not know about the theological schools.

Mr. MAYS. Including board?

Mr. TOWNER. No; not to that extent.

Mr. MAYS. Simply tuition?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and the gentleman will understand that we give a very liberal allowance to the soldier that would assist him in taking care of that. It was for that reason that they did not include professional education in this bill.

Now, let me say a word as to how this bill originated. This bill originated in the Council of National Defense as a war measure. The Council of National Defense is composed, as you know, of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and other Secretaries in the Cabinet. They called together the experts from every department into conference, 50 or more in number, and they appointed a subcommittee for the special consideration of this legislation, and the only and sole purpose of it all was to formulate a plan for vocational education.

After they had considered it these gentlemen appointed a special board for the purpose of formulating the necessary legislation. That board consisted of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt, a representative of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, a representative of the Interior Department, a representative from the Surgeon General's Office, and one from the Federal Board of Vocational Education, together with Dr. Gifford, the secretary of the Council of National Defense. That board formulated a plan and submitted it to the respective committees of the House and the Senate. The only thing that they considered, the only thing they recommended, is this bill for vocational rehabilitation. So this bill is an administration measure if there ever was one. Gentlemen who desire to support the prosecution of the war, and the administration in the prosecution of the war, ought to hesitate long before they attempt to change the object and purpose of the bill to something entirely different.

Now, what does this motion mean? It means to strike out the word "vocational" from rehabilitation. The word "rehabilitation" is used throughout the bill, in the same manner and correlatively with "training," so that it means vocational training. Some of us thought it would have been better to omit the word "rehabilitation" and keep the word "training" all the way through. But what it meant and what we propose to give them is vocational training, and that is all. We propose to give them under the operation of the bill vocational training. We have provided already for the rehabilitating of the soldiers and sailors physically and mentally; that is, take care of all by the provisions of the law under which the surgeons and the medical officers of the Army and the Navy care for these men in the hospitals.

They restore them; they rehabilitate them, physically and mentally; and this bill undertakes to restore them and make them independent vocationally. When you strike out the word "vocational" you change the purpose of the bill entirely. You say to this educational board to which we have committed this vocational training, "We also commit to you the physical and mental and every other kind of rehabilitation you can think of." That never was intended by the administration nor imagined possible by anyone connected with the making of the bill.

I say to you gentlemen that, in my judgment, if this amendment is adopted you will either kill the bill or delay its passage indefinitely. Do you suppose in the Senate those who have considered and discussed the bill critically for three days and have determined upon its plan and scope and purpose; do you believe the sponsors of the bill for vocational rehabilitation; do you suppose the administration will be with you, when you change the entire character of the bill? That is the responsibility you gentlemen take if you strike out the word "vocational." I hope there is not a man on this side of the House, and so far there has been no man on it, that will delay the passage of this war legislation that is imperative now by a single hour or a single day. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemen has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, gentlemen, will you on the other side of the House, knowing as I do your desire to assist the administration in carrying on this war, will you complicate this situation by delaying this legislation? There is not a single man of you but knows that if you send the bill back to the Senate changed as it will be, fundamentally and radically, from something that they have not had under consideration at all—there is not a man but that will hesitate to do that. I ask you as the earnest supporters of war legislation, as the earnest supporters of the administration, not to take this responsibility. I think you will hesitate long before you will do such a thing as that.

Ah, gentlemen, this is too important now. There is not a single member of the committee who has not thought that he would like to see some changes made in the bill. I have believed that some changes ought to be made in the bill, but they are unimportant, and I am willing to let them go, because we need this legislation, and we need it now. But this change, this vital, fundamental change ought not be made, because it will imperil the bill if it is made and because it will delay the bill inevitably. So I ask gentlemen, with all respect for those who are honestly endeavoring to enlarge the scope of the bill, not to insist at this time upon this amendment.

Mr. MAYS. Would not the gentleman's argument prevent the amendment of any bill?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; if such amendment would change the entire character of the bill and make it something entirely different from the proposed legislation. This bill has been presented as a plan for vocational education for our disabled soldiers and sailors. As such it has been approved by the administration, unanimously indorsed by both Senate and House committees, and passed by a unanimous vote of the Senate. To now entirely change the character of the bill would have the effect to defeat the legislation as it was intended.

Mr. MAYS. That, however, should not prevent amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. It should prevent the killing of the bill or the delay of the bill, and that is what will happen if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have been out of the House, and I would ask how much debate there is upon this.

The CHAIRMAN. There is 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, was it not 25 minutes? Five or six minutes have been granted to the Members by unanimous consent, and in that way the committee has extended the time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think, with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], that the importance of this amendment justifies having at least an hour's debate upon it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have 5 minutes in the 25 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to an hour, instead of 25 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that gentlemen desire to discuss the matter to that extent, and I am anxious to be as expeditious as possible. As I stated on Saturday, when we went into this agreement, I am going to be as liberal under the circumstances as the circumstances will justify, but I do not think we ought to unnecessarily extend the limit of debate upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been limited to 25 minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

Mr. WELLING. Is it not a fact that only 10 of those minutes have been consumed? As I understand it, the time of the gentleman from Iowa was extended for 5 minutes by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. He was recognized for 10 minutes and then was granted an extension of 2 minutes.

Mr. WELLING. As I understand it, he was recognized for only five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman from Utah occupied five minutes of time and had an extension of two minutes.

Mr. WELLING. But the time extension of both these gentlemen was by unanimous consent, that time not to be subtracted from the 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is the general practice of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I could not say in five minutes that which will contribute very much to the consideration of the matter before us. I have some hesitation in rising at all because I have not given that attention to the bill that I would have been glad to give if I had had more leisure. I call attention to the fact that never in the history of any country on earth have such provisions been made for injury compensation, so called, practically pensions, for insurance, for pay, for maintenance of dependents, and so forth, as have been made by legislation in this Congress up to this time. I am heartily in favor of this bill as it is written, as I have read it and given as much attention to it as I could. I am not in favor of this amendment. A man with both arms off, with both legs off, has a compensation of $100 a month. The man who wants to become a minister or a lawyer or a doctor will get along very well, so far as that is concerned, and perhaps he would not come under the bill at all upon his own motion, and of course he could not be forced under it. But a small percentage of people compared with the number of our soldiers of this war will come under the bill, if it passes as it is now. Men so badly injured that something more in the shape of vocational training seems to be necessary will come under the provisions of this bill if they so elect, and this seems to be the trend of general public sentiment. In the Civil War the number of men who were severely wounded, who had legs off or arms off, who were incapacitated, were comparatively small with respect to the whole number engaged, and let me say to you, North and South, those men took possession of the politics of the country and the policies of the country at the close of the war. If you will just draw on your recollection for a moment, you will bear me out in stating that they came to Congress, that they were in the State legislatures, that they held county offices, and that they shaped and molded public sentiment North and South after the close of the war. We still have some of them with us and worthily so.

Take it, North and South, I say again, they became in the development of this country the great controlling factors, not only in what we ordinarily call politics but in broader fields than that. They were found as engineers, they were found as doctors, they were found as lawyers, they were found as politicians, they were found as ministers and professors and teachers, and, Mr. Chairman, we ought not to forget that when the boys come home at the close of this war, at a time when I shall be wearing, I suppose, an asbestos halo, they will take possession and direction, and worthily so, of the affairs of government, because they will have that rare experience and rare patriotism that will come from their service. [Applause.] So that if a boy wants to be a minister or a lawyer, if he has both legs off, if he is blind, if he shows a capacity along that line, all of the colleges are open to him and he will be preferred. It is the young man who goes in and who comes back blind or with his legs off or his arms off or mentally impaired that will be required to be restored.

Now, we can take and do this worthy service; the professions will take care of themselves as to those who are competent and desire to enter the professions. I listened with much interest to the closing remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and I agree with them heartily, and I hope the amendment will not prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement I had five minutes' time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, when I took count of those who desired to speak I thought I could cover the time in 25 minutes, and I assured the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] that he would have five minutes of that time. He has offered the amendment, and I think it is nothing but right that he should have at least five minutes. Therefore I ask unanimous consent on account of this peculiar situation that the time be extended five minutes in order that that amount of time may be yielded to the gentleman from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended an additional five minutes to be allotted to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, let me ask what time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman modify his request on the same basis so that I may at least have five minutes?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will yield part of my time so as to apply seven minutes between us.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, call me at the end of three minutes and give the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] four minutes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of every member of this committee to the amendment that appeals to all of us, but I am afraid that we are making a mistake by allowing sentiment to control what we do here. Especially I want to call attention of Members from the Democratic side of the House that this bill has to do with vocational training, the management is by the vocational board, and if you go into professional training I should like to have you note what you are embarking on. If you want to take these boys and give them their training you must understand that under our present drift the boy must be a college-bred boy in order to get into a first-class law school. That means that he must have had a high-school training, a four years' course in college, and then he can enter the law school or the school of medicine, and if you propose to embark upon the scheme of giving professional education to the boys who come back here you are starting on a Federal scheme of education that applies to education under the Federal Government instead of under the State government, as is always the case, and I should think that is a pretty serious move to make at the present time.

This bill is not to give professional training of four years or of three years to some one who is going to take up a profession, who has already had a college education in order to take a profession, but it is to take a boy who is crippled and give him an opportunity to resume the work that he was doing before he was crippled, or if he could not do that to take up some new work, or if he had never taken up any work to embark upon some method of making a living. It is not intended that the Government should educate him for some profession that he is already prepared for, and while it appeals to me wonderfully personally, because those of my home who are in the service are college-bred men and look to something besides vocational training, I do not think that the Government ought to take them and prepare them for a profession. That is not the purpose of this bill. As I said before, it is a very serious embarkation you are launching on if you start in on professional training here instead of vocational training. It rearranges all the plan, and I hope that the amendment will not be carried by sentiment but will be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have seen a great many good amendments defeated in this House upon the theory that it is our duty to surrender our judgment and follow the committee. If that rule is to prevail at all, it ought to prevail in its fullest extent, and therefore when a bill has been reported by a committee the House ought to be compelled to accept it without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." If you do not go that far, you ought not to urge that course at all, because that is the legitimate and obvious end, of course. I do not blame gentlemen for having pride in their committee work, and yet I do not think they ought to carry it to the extent to which they say: "If you do not agree with us, your effort will result in the defeat of the measure." With all due deference to those who differ from me in this matter, I assert that the only question involved is the question of costs. It costs more possibly to give young men professional training than vocational training. If you decide that your Government ought not to be generous—no; not generous but just—in dealing with these boys who go out and are maimed defending your Government, fighting that our people may live the life they choose, vote against this amendment, and by that vote you say, "I deny to you the right to follow out your destiny." And that is what you do if you vote against the amendment. Under this bill, in line 16, page 4, the board will have the power when it is created to prescribe the course that must be followed by maimed soldiers and sailors who are to be rehabilitated. It can say what he must follow in its prescribed course, and in the event he refuses to do it another provision of the bill gives the board the power to withdraw from him all assistance of the Government until he surrenders his individual choice and accepts the dictation of this board. If you want to do that, if you want to say to the young men of this country, "If you are ready to be bakers and candlestick makers when you come back maimed for life, we will help you to do that, but all other callings are closed against you," shall we accept their sacrifice and deny to them choice of calling when wounds render them unable to serve us longer? We by our votes in Congress, if we defeat this amendment, will have said, "We reserve for us and our sons the right to choose a calling, but we give to you the opportunity of having your hands trained, nothing more." Can we afford to do this? The gentleman from Iowa thought it wrong to talk about this House bettering the bill.

If it is true, if the Senate has said to us—and I presume it has spoken through the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], because I assume he would not make the assertion without authority—and if the Senate has said to him and authorized him to say to this House that "If you cross a 't' and dot an 'i,' the legislation will die," the responsibility is with the Senate and not with us. I am not going to abrogate my right to pass upon the justness of legislation under such threat. [Applause.] I am supporting this bill, and I have done so and I am going to do so. I am wedded to its aims, but I wish to go further and do as full justice as we can to these unfortunate boys, and that this would kill the bill is absurd. It will cost more money; that is all. If you think they do not deserve so much, vote against the amendment. Dollars will be saved and lives embittered; that is all. The gentleman from Iowa assures us the administration would oppose the amendment. By what authority does he speak? I question his authority. I refuse to believe our President would want to do an injustice to these unfortunate boys who now so freely offer their lives that human rights may live. Of course the amendment would neither kill nor delay the bills passage, because, the gentleman's proposition is true and the universities and schools are open to the boys, all you have to do is to supply them the means; and that is all we ask you to do in this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in favor of the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I will have to object to that. We have had a thorough understanding. I regret very much to do it, but I will have to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the courses of vocational rehabilitation provided for under this act shall, as far as practicable and under such conditions as the board may prescribe, be made available without cost for instruction for the benefit of any person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under Article III of said act and who is not included in section 2 hereof: Provided, That no monthly compensation, family allowances, or expenses as provided by this act shall be paid on account of any such person availing himself of the courses under this section: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall deprive any such person of the benefit of the provisions of said act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 6, strike out all of lines 6, 7, and 8 and all the words in line 9 preceding the word "that" in said line.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, after a consultation with members of the committee and others who have given careful scrutiny to the purposes of the bill in connection with the phraseology here used, we have decided it was not necessary to prohibit the allowance of monthly compensation, family allowances, or expenses, and so forth, as set out, and these words should be struck out. I do not think it requires any further argument. It is a committee amendment that I ask you to adopt.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FESS. To propound an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. We are leaving in the bill that second proviso:

That nothing in this section shall deprive any such person of the benefits of the provisions of said act.

I would like to ask my friend whether he now feels perfectly satisfied that that does carry with it the family allowance?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That last provision?

Mr. FESS. It says everything in the said act, which is the war-risk insurance provision, and here is the thing that has been raised in my mind after studying over the thing last night, and I would like to have the chairman's opinion on it. When the soldier is discharged the family allowances stop?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Now, by striking out that proviso——

Mr. BANKHEAD. You mean the proviso?

Mr. FESS. I mean striking out lines 7 and 8, which is a prohibition of any compensation and family allowance, and leaving the provision as it is written, "That nothing in this section shall deprive any such person of the benefit of the provisions of said act," which is the war-insurance act. There is no benefit under the war-insurance act, under family allowance, when the soldier is discharged. I fear he is not getting the family allowance under the wording of this.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to my friend from Ohio that that had very careful consideration, and it was the consensus of the opinion of the members of the committee that the situation was taken care of. If there was any question about it we would not offer that amendment, but, in our judgment, we think the other sections of the bill take care of the family-allowance provision, and that is a provision as to the payment.

Mr. FESS. I will say this to my friend, that leaving it as the amendment proposes will at least do less harm than to leave the inhibition in it. We are sure of that, but as to whether or not this is giving precisely what the Member wanted, namely, the family allowance, to be continued while he is in the service—which would be true in section 2, but I doubt very much as to section 3—I doubt very much if that will be true without putting an express provision in it excepting family allowances. If we should say "No monthly compensation or expenses are provided by this act except family allowances," then we would know it would go in. But I am not raising any question, except one of doubt in my own mind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We were of the opinion it would be covered by other sections of the bill after the elimination of the language by the amendment I have suggested. I will say to my friend from Ohio that the members of the committee had some consultation about it during his absence and that we reached that conclusion.

Mr. FESS. All right. I will not make any objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the Chair submitted the negative vote on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not. The gentleman from Ohio asks for recognition.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised at the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] a few moments ago, in which he took to task somewhat those who tried to amend this bill.

I think this is one of the most important bills that has come before this Congress, and I am heartily in favor of doing everything possible to provide a complete and thorough system for the rehabilitation of the soldiers who may be disabled. To me it seems it is absolutely necessary that this rehabilitation should be provided in such a way as to appeal to the men.

I am afraid that the Members who have had charge of the preparation of this bill have not done a good work in the compensation features and in the allotment and allowance features, and I predict that unless these features are changed it will be in utter confusion from the very day it is passed.

Now, under section 2 what is the compensation that is to be paid these men under this act? I have read it carefully and have spoken to some of the members of the committee, and I understand it is their intention to confine the compensation to what the soldier would have received under article 3 of the war-risk insurance bill where his Army pay does not exceed that amount. But this act goes further and says that under this act his compensation shall be, first, the pay that he received in the last month of his service, or, second, an amount equal to the amount to which he would be entitled under article 3 of said act, whichever amount is greater.

Now, I contend that the wounded man is entitled to what he would have received under article 3, without regard to this act. It is given to him by the war-risk insurance act. Therefore, under this bill he will receive, in addition to that, his monthly pay, provided it exceeds what he would receive under article 3, and if it does not exceed what he would receive under article 3 he receives as much again as he would receive under article 3. Now, then, when they go on further and provide for the allotment, they restrict it absolutely to the wife and children, and they base the allotment upon the monthly compensation. If it was their intention not to pay the man anything more than he got under article 3, then, he does not get any compensation under this act, if their interpretation of their language is correct. But no lawyer reading it can come to any other conclusion than that he receives under this act an amount equal at least to what he would receive under article 3 of the war-risk insurance act.

Why should the allotment and allowance be confined to those who have wives and children? Will not these men who come back, who have dependent parents and dependent brothers and sisters, be anxious to get back home to earn something for their families? And if you are going to permit this allotment why not allow those men who have gone into the service with dependent fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters to take advantage of the allotment and allowance provision of the war-risk insurance law while they are undergoing this course of rehabilitation?

I submit that there is no answer to that objection, except that they should have the right. But under this law they can not do it, and the men who have dependent fathers and mothers, in order to provide for them, will not take advantage of this, perhaps, but will want to go back to the ready employment which, everybody knows, these men will be able to find from patriotic citizens who are anxious, immediately after the injury has been received, to aid them. Again, under the bill as written there is not any doubt in the world but that if a man starts to take a course of rehabilitation and does not continue it he can be deprived of every cent of compensation not only for a month or two, but forever.

And so I hope that the members of this committee will consider it between now and the time this bill passes the House, because it is a Senate bill, and if sections 2 and 3 are not amended now before it is passed I predict that there will be much confusion from the day the bill is signed, and those who administer it will never be able to interpret it in the way the members of the committee wish it interpreted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of propounding a general inquiry to gentlemen of the committee. As there has been some uncertainty in the minds of many of us regarding this very important bill, I take the liberty of stating my understanding of it, and I will be very glad to have the members of the committee correct me if I am in error.

The underlying purpose of this measure, as I read it, is the rehabilitation of persons disabled in the service of their country, and it does not apply to anyone who is not entitled to compensation under the war-risk insurance act for injuries received in line of duty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. HICKS. Upon discharge from the military or naval hospitals, it is entirely optional with the men to avail themselves of this vocation training. There is no compulsion, and even the choice of a trade course is optional. If the men elect to take the training they will be graded into two classes. Class 1 will be composed of men whose injuries prevent them resuming their old occupations or engaging in any gainful trade. These men are dependents. Section 2 provides for this class.

Mr. FESS. That is right.

Mr. HICKS. Then class 2 will be composed of men who are able to resume their old occupations or enter new ones. These men will be self-supporting but desire to perfect themselves, and will be permitted to take the courses prescribed by the Board for Vocational Education free of cost.

Men who are in class 1 will have the option, while they are taking the courses, of continuing to accept the compensation they are entitled to receive under the war-risk insurance act or to draw pay based on the salary received the last month they were in the service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. HICKS. There has been some confusion on that point, and I am glad my understanding of the provisions is correct. In other words, the men may choose either the pension plan or the pay plan, whichever is to their advantage, but in either case provision is made for compulsory monthly allowances or allotments to the family.

If they elect to accept the salary compensation plan, they must, while in training, relinquish temporarily, compensation under the war-risk insurance act. In this case family allowances will go on as prescribed by existing law. If they elect to continue compensation under the war-risk insurance plan, then their families will receive allotment payments based on this compensation, as provided for in section 2. If the men are in class 2, they will receive their education free, but will not be permitted to draw any compensation under the pay plan, but, of course, they will receive compensation under the pension or war-risk insurance plan. Is that correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. HICKS. That is the point in dispute. I thank the gentleman from Alabama for his courtesy, and congratulate him for his able work on this measure.

I thoroughly believe in the principle of this bill. We owe it to the sailors and soldiers themselves to leave nothing undone which will promote their welfare and advance their interests. They have made the sacrifice, and it is our duty to provide for them to the utmost of our ability. A pension is not sufficient; we must make them useful and independent factors in our economical life. We owe it to society and to the future of our Republic to rehabilitate these men and restore them to industrial pursuits in order to conserve the man power of our country and assure the advance of the Nation in industrial progress and the continuous development of our resources. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there are three classes of heroes who excite our admiration. One is the man who enlists in the service of his country and dies in its defense. Another is the man who enlists and comes back from the wars wounded and maimed. The third is the man who carries on a successful war and returns to us uninjured, but having done his full duty. I feel that we can not too highly commend them all. Of course, the man who dies can not come back to tell of his valor. The man who is maimed may come back, but he comes inviting our sympathy along with our praise. We should give to him the best care and attention that is possible, and for that reason I am in favor of the passage of this vocational-training bill.

I have been making inquiries recently in regard to the men who die in the service abroad, with a view of having their bodies preserved and brought back, so that their relatives may have the privilege, if they desire, of giving them decent interment in their native land. The matter has been brought to the attention of the House through communications of the Secretary of War. I am in a position now to report from the War Department the final conclusion that it has reached upon this question. It arises in a case brought to the attention of the department some time ago, and is embodied in the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 5, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 28, 1918, inclosing copy of a letter to you from Mr. Henry Clair, father of Capt. Frederick David Clair, United States Medical Corps, who was killed in France a few days ago, requesting your assistance in having the body of his son returned to this country for interment.

The question of returning the bodies of soldiers who are killed or die on foreign service has been considered by the War Department and the Navy Department in conjunction. The committee considering this matter went into the case in all its aspects and it has been decided that the bodies of our soldiers, sailors, marines, and civilian employees who are killed or die in France can not be returned to this country for interment until after the close of the war. Gen. Pershing has arranged with the French Government for sections of the country to be used as military cemeteries, and the Quartermaster Corps has organized and are now operating in France certain organizations called Grave Registration Units. These units are charged with the duty of burying the dead, caring for the cemeteries, and the identification records of those buried. This is done in such a manner that there will be no confusion or doubt as to the identity of any soldier now buried when his body is taken up to be transported home after the war. For obvious reasons no other conclusion could be arrived at under existing conditions, the main feature being that of ocean transportation. The department regrets that it is unable to comply with the request of Mr. Clair.

Sincerely, yours,

F. P. KEPPEL,
Third Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, many Members have received inquiries concerning the return of the soldier dead, and I desired to have this letter read for their information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment heretofore offered will be withdrawn.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers a substitute for the committee amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VESTAL, of Indiana, offers the following substitute for the committee amendment: Page 4, line 6, after the word "that," strike out "no monthly compensation," and change the word "or" after "allowances" to "and"; and in line 7, after the word "expenses," insert the word "only."

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this substitute for this reason. I can not understand why a man in the class mentioned in section 3 of this bill who is able to follow his former occupation but can not produce to the maximum, who desires to take this course, and the board permits him to take the course—I can not understand, I say, how his family is in any better condition than the family of a man mentioned in section 2, unable to follow any vocation who takes this course. That is to say, the family of any of these soldiers taking the course of vocational education should have the family allowance. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] cuts out the family allowance to this class, and provides a compensation and family allotment provided for under the war-risk insurance act.

My amendment proposes to give them a family allowance as provided for in this act, together with compensation and allotment provided under the war-risk insurance act, while taking this course of vocational education. I can see no difference between the families of the two different classes. I think the young man who is able to partially provide for his family but who can not produce to the maximum, who elects to take this course, while he is taking the course, if he has a wife and children, that wife and children should be cared for, and I think the Government ought to care for them by giving them a family allowance while he is taking the course.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to state to the committee that the purpose of excluding compensation and family allowance as provided under the war-risk insurance bill to these soldiers who are disabled, but who are able to resume their work and carrying it on successfully, was written on this basis: That if the soldier coming back disabled could go on with his work successfully, it would be a question of his disability under the war-risk insurance act. It certainly would not be total, and it is a question whether it would be partial. The war-risk insurance act makes this provision:

If and while the disability is partial, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total disability, equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.

If he has resumed his position when he came home, the question is whether he is partially disabled, not certainly in earning capacity, because he has resumed his work. Therefore this bill omitted, in the case of the man who could resume his work, all the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, omitted compensation, and it is a question whether they would get it anyway if their disability was not sufficient to resume their earning capacity. They also omit the family allowance. There was a strong sentiment in the committee that there ought to be a family allowance to the boy who, after having come home and resumed work, wanted to do better work, and desired to come and take the training, that his family ought to have advantage of the compulsory allowance. However, I felt from the beginning that it would be best not to open the Treasury of the Government to those who had resumed the work and are successfully carrying it on. You do not know where the limit would be, and therefore I have been from the beginning inclined to omit the compensation and family allowance to this class in section 3. However, I am not going to worry over giving them a family allowance which is provided by the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VESTAL) there were 11 ayes and 13 noes.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

At the request of Mr. DALLINGER, the amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 2, after the word "disabled," strike out down to and including the word "hereof" in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by reason of service in the military or naval forces of the United States from pursuing a suitable vocation."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment not with any expectation that it would be adopted, because it so seriously changes the bill passed by the Senate and now being considered. I expect to withdraw it after I have said what I wish to say. I merely want to call the attention of the committee to a very serious situation which is not provided for in this bill or in any other way.

I find that a large number of soldiers are being discharged by reason of disability and yet are allowed no compensation, although their health was considered good enough to take them into the Army. They passed all physical requirements, but are discharged by reason of physical disability, and yet it is claimed that that physical disability under which they are discharged originated in some way before they entered the service.

One hundred years ago the traveler in England, in London, perhaps, noted sitting in the shadow of the Nelson Monument old sailors and soldiers, heroes of Trafalgar or Waterloo, maimed and disabled, begging, asking that somebody give them a farthing with which to buy food. At the same time Wellsley had been made a duke and Nelson a viscount, and both of them had received large grants of money. The custom seems to have been at that time to reward those who least needed reward and who had already been rewarded by the positions which had been given them in the army or the navy. At this time another spirit prevails. The old methods are gone. The world has moved. It has become more charitable, more kindly, more considerate. An example is found in this bill, where it is sought to care for those who can least care for themselves, and I am heartily in favor of its provisions.

This is, perhaps, the highest example of this forward movement which has gone over the world during the present war in the way of caring for the maimed soldiers who have been disabled in carrying on their country's flag. But now, under the circumstances that I have mentioned, there are being discharged from many of our hospitals men who shortly after they entered the war were found to have developed tuberculosis, and they are allowed nothing under the compensation act and they can get no benefit under this bill. They are absolutely disabled from carrying on their former vocations. They are passed out as derelicts upon the world. It has sometimes been said that republics are always ungrateful, but this bill is an example that this is not the case. Yet it is an example of how we are inclined to overlook some of our beneficiaries because they do not belong to a numerous class, and yet are numerous enough so that they ought to have some attention. We are careless, likewise, about those who are in our hospitals, and in this respect I am not finding fault with the Medical Department; but somehow, because there is not proper provision made for their care, young men suffering from rheumatism or tuberculosis are having their young lives burned out in some pesthole or hospital located in a swamp camp in the South—young men who were brought from northern regions, who never had seen a hot day until they went South, and never knew what it was to feel the heat.

Mr. HICKS. Did they come from Iowa?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not from Iowa, but from other regions. There is heat enough in Iowa at times—from Idaho, from Colorado, from other States that I could mention.

Mr. HICKS. And from Long Island?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; not from Long Island. They know something about heat there. I am sorry to see that gentlemen are not inclined to take this thing seriously. It does seem strange that cases of what amount to heartless cruelty are not received with seriousness by the House.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman mean to say that the case that he described will not come under the compensation law?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I do not, so far as those confined in the hospitals are concerned. I am speaking of the fact that the compensation law has simply jumped over their heads in making no provision to give them proper care.

There are, however, many discharged on account of disability who receive no benefit from the compensation law and are unable to take care of themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The compensation law, while caring for a large class of our young men who need relief, has overlooked a smaller and possibly an even more deserving class that have not been cared for, and in the instances I mentioned would have to be cared for by a bill of an entirely different nature. It also overlooks a small class of those who do not come under the compensatin act at all, but who nevertheless have been disabled by reason of their service in the Army or the Navy—men who went in, as I know, men from my own district, who were able to do a good solid day's work on a farm before they went into the Army, and who now are not able to take care of themselves and yet are receiving no benefit under the compensation act and can receive no benefit under this bill. It is a matter that ought to be considered.

Mr. FARR. Would these men be precluded from getting a pension?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They would get one only by a special act.

Mr. FESS. This bill limits its operation entirely to the beneficiaries of the war-risk insurance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the war-risk insurance act ought to be amended to cover those people. If it were so amended, then this bill would cover them also.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Ohio suggests a remedy, and quite a proper one, that I hope will be adopted. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to withdraw his amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the section by striking out the second proviso on page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of lines 9, 10, and 11, page 4, the following language: "that nothing in this section shall deprive any such person of the benefit of the provisions of this act."

Also, strike out the word "provided" in line 5, page 4.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this second proviso was added to qualify the first proviso, and now that we have stricken out the first proviso by the adoption of the committee amendment offered by my colleague Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, this second proviso is nothing but surplusage, because the only people under section 3 of this act who are entitled to avail themselves of these vocational courses are soldiers and sailors who are disabled under circumstances entitling them after their discharge to compensation under article 3 of said act, which means the war-risk insurance act. It is manifestly surplusage to add that nothing in this act shall prevent them from getting the compensation to which they are already entitled under that act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the question was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall also be the duty of the board to make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placement in suitable or gainful occupations. When the board deems it advisable, such studies, investigations, and reports may be made in cooperation with or through other departments and bureaus of the Government, and the board in its discretion may cooperate with such public or private agencies as it may deem advisable in performing the duties imposed upon it by this act.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONERGAN: Page 5, line 8: At the end of line 8, insert "persons honorably discharged from the military or naval services of the United States by reason of disabilities resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty shall be preferred for appointment to offices or places of employment under the United States Government whenever the board shall certify they are qualified to perform the duties of said office or employment, existing law or laws and rule or rules of the Civil Service Commission notwithstanding.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the amendment if the gentleman from Connecticut desires to discuss it.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, an examination of existing law leaves the impression that it does not cover present conditions. We are giving to the vocational board unlimited powers in the training of men who meet with injury in the service, and in section 5, among other powers, we propose to give to this board the authority to place these men in positions when they are trained. Now, I appreciate that the Civil Service Commission does not want to have its powers encroached upon or curtailed in any way, but if we give the powers—almost unlimited powers—to the vocational board to train the men who are to be under its direct supervision, why is not that board the proper one to state whether or not a man is qualified to fill a certain governmental position, and the man injured in the service certainly ought to have a preference in so far as Government positions are concerned. If men injured in the line of duty are compelled to enter into competition with boys fresh from the high school, boys who have formed habits of study, the chances are that those men who have been out of school for many years will not be able to compete with those young men, and yet they will be competent to fulfill the duties of the positions which they seek after their years of experience in the world, and those years of experience plus their services to their country and plus the training that they will receive under this vocational board ought to make those men preferred. The men best fitted to determine whether or not they are competent to fill those positions are the members of the vocational board, under whose guidance they are to receive this training. I think this is a matter worthy of our attention, and the amendment worthy of adoption, and I hope that the members of the committee will take that view of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say I do not think it is necessary to discuss the merits of the point of order which I shall make in just a moment, but before doing that I desire to say that I am sure every member of this committee and the House is in full sympathy with the purpose sought to be reached by the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, and, as has been stated heretofore in discussions upon this bill, there is now pending before the Committee on Civil Service Reform at least one bill by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to clear up any doubt there might be in reference to the applicability of the general statute on this question as affecting disabled soldiers of the present war, and I feel sure that in due course and before the adjournment of this Congress that that bill will be favorably reported by that committee and receive a unanimous vote upon both sides of the House. But the committee considered that phase of the case at an informal session and it determined in view of the parliamentary situation and the general agreement to make an effort to expedite the passage of this bill without serious amendment, that we could not accept it under the circumstances. Now I make the point of order that it is new legislation, that it affects existing law, and that it is not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, just a word on that. If the Chair will look in line 8, I call attention to the word "placement." It says:

That it shall be the duty of the board to make, or cause to have made, studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placement in suitable or gainful occupations.

I maintain that it is germane at this place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill under consideration is a bill to provide for vocational rehabilitation. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut is an amendment specifying the qualifications of certain persons to hold places and to give them a preferred status. The bill does not relate in any of its essential features to the appointment or qualification of officers, and it seems to the Chair that the amendment is not germane to the bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That all medical and surgical work or other treatment necessary to give functional and mental restoration to disabled persons prior to their discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States shall be under the control of the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively. Whenever training is employed as a therapeutic measure by the War Department or the Navy Department a plan may be established between these agencies and the board acting in an advisory capacity to insure, in so far as medical requirements permit, a proper process of training and the proper preparation of instructors for such training. A plan may also be established between the War and Navy Departments and the board whereby these departments shall act in an advisory capacity with the board in the care of the health of the soldier and sailor after his discharge.

The board shall, in establishing its plans and rules and regulations for vocational training, cooperate with the War Department and the Navy Department in so far as may be necessary to effect a continuous process of vocational training.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee the purpose of the language on page 6, line 3, where it says the War and Navy Departments shall act in an advisory capacity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Where is that?

Mr. IGOE. Page 6, line 3. It is provided:

A plan may also be established between the War and Navy Departments and the board whereby these departments shall act in an advisory capacity with the board in the care of the health of the soldier and sailor after his discharge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I will state to the gentleman from Missouri, that the features of this whole section are the result of a series of compromises between the vocational board and the Surgeon General's offices of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. IGOE. Why not——

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has asked me a question——

Mr. IGOE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The purpose is, if the gentleman will note, the first part of the section bestows absolute control and jurisdiction upon the Medical and Surgical Departments of the Army and Navy to have control of the man during his functional or physical restoration.

Mr. IGOE. I understand that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It provides that they work out a plan between them and the vocational board and that the representative of the vocational board may go in a hospital for the purpose of acting in an advisory capacity only, and he suggests what avocation or work this man shall follow when finally rehabilitated. This was agreed upon as a feasible practice and desirable.

Then it was thought that after the man had been discharged from the hospital sufficiently restored to be prepared for some vocational trade, it might be well for the representatives of the surgical department of the Army and Navy, in an advisory capacity merely, to follow the man up and say whether or not they could render any advice or suggestion that might be helpful to him along lines not only of the continuation of his health, but with reference to the vocation he was being taught to follow.

Mr. IGOE. Take, for instance, the case of a man after he is out of the jurisdiction of the War or Navy Departments and under the jurisdiction of the board, and it should develop that medical or surgical treatment was necessary, if you limit under this section the War and the Navy Departments to advisory capacity, will they be able to take such men into the Army or Navy hospitals, no matter how numerous those hospitals may be or how well equipped or supplied with attendants?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It was not, as I understand, the purpose of that provision. You understand he is discharged from the Army——

Mr. IGOE. I understand that; but why not permit an arrangement to be made between this board and the War Department and the Navy Department whereby, if they can agree upon it, the Army or Navy hospitals and the surgeons might be used to give necessary treatment to these men?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think that is prohibited at all.

Mr. IGOE. It is if you limit it to an advisory capacity. Why is it not? Under the law now if men are discharged they can not receive treatment in the hospitals of the Army and Navy.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. IGOE. Yes. I am trying to get the information.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; that is all right, and it is a question, perhaps, that was discussed more in the Senate than any other one question. Now, this section, not very clearly but satisfactorily to those who have opposing views in the Senate, is intended to carry out this kind of an arrangement. If a man is injured, for instance, by losing an arm or a leg, then he does not need very much surgical and medical attention. He is soon discharged, and he goes out, and it is not necessary that he should receive any vocational instruction while he is in the hospital. But you take a man that is injured by shell shot, which paralyzes him, sometimes both arms and both legs, and sometimes the arms and sometimes the legs——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. If he is suffering from shell shock, then a different condition ensues. The man has to be very largely treated vocationally. So they take this man and in order to enable him to use his arms and fingers they teach him, for instance, to be a typewriter operator. Now, then, the object is that the vocational board shall cooperate with the surgeons and medical officers while the patient is in the hospital and before he is discharged from the Army. Now, then, the medical and surgical officers finally agree that the board may cooperate, in an advisory capacity only, with them.

Mr. IGOE. I can understand that, but——

Mr. TOWNER. I am coming now to the point you raise. Now, the medical and surgical officers wanted the authority to advise and, in fact, treat——

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman says "treat." That is the point I want to get at.

Mr. TOWNER. That is just exactly why this clause was introduced by the friends of the surgeons and medical officers of the Army and Navy—for the very purpose of giving them the authority to act in an advisory capacity after the man had been discharged from the service. Of course, they would have no authority unless it was under the terms of this bill. So you have this condition, that up until the time when a man is discharged he is under control of the Army and Navy officers, the board having the right only to act in an advisory capacity. But the Army and Navy officers lose their authority when he is discharged from the Army, and the board then is the supreme authority, and the Army and Navy officers only have advisory authority.

Mr. IGOE. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think it proper that the Army and Navy should have control of him when he is in the hospital and that the board should have charge of him after that, but what I am anxious to know is this, whether by the insertion of the words "in an advisory capacity" you do not limit the work that the War and Navy Departments may do—for instance, in permitting the use of hospitals by these patients and their treatment by Army and Navy surgeons? If that treatment is necessary, why should they not be permitted to take advantage of it?

Mr. TOWNER. That is exactly what would happen. If the Army and Navy officers advised him to go back for treatment——

Mr. IGOE. What authority of law is there for it now?

Mr. TOWNER. There is no authority of law for it.

Mr. IGOE. If you take out "in an advisory capacity" it would enable the War and Navy Departments to agree with the board on a plan for the treatment and care of the health of the soldier after discharge.

Mr. TOWNER. That is true, because the Army and Navy officers could not have anything except an advisory capacity, and they might advise that he should go into the hospital.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman think as it is worded now that after the discharge of the man from the Army or Navy the War Department or the Navy Department might be permitted to treat one of these men in the hospitals in the Army?

Mr. TOWNER. Send them back to hospitals? Certainly. There is no question about that.

Mr. IGOE. If that is so——

Mr. TOWNER. That is the situation. Suppose a man goes into a factory to work, and he develops a condition necessary for hospital treatment? That is what this is for, so that the Army and Navy officers could send him back there for treatment.

Mr. IGOE. If the gentleman will pardon me, when you say their authority is limited to an advisory capacity, unless there is some other provision under which they can permit the soldier or sailor to enter the hospital, does not that limit it to just what it says, namely, "advisory capacity," and they can not use the funds of the Army or Navy for the treatment of men who have just been discharged?

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman know that if the surgeons or the medical officers advise the man to go to a hospital he would do it?

Mr. IGOE. Yes; but they have no authority of law for using the money now for treating discharged soldiers and sailors. That is what I am talking about. I have had experience in trying to get treatment for men discharged. But I am afraid that you can not do it when you insert the words "in an advisory capacity."

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, one of the great problems the Congress of the United States will have to consider in a wise and careful manner is the rehabilitation and return to civil employment of our soldiers and sailors who may be wounded fighting upon the battle fields of France and the high seas, and any legislation providing for the welfare of our soldiers and sailors will always have my unqualified support.

My colleagues will recall my efforts in behalf of the soldiers in endeavoring to assist them in securing free transportation upon the railroads when going home on a furlough. You will also recall my attempt to have the war-risk insurance act amended to protect all soldiers and sailors from the time they are placed upon the trains at their home cities until they have had an opportunity to avail themselves of the provisions of the war-risk insurance act.

I also believe every citizen of this Republic—no matter what his station in life may be or his occupation—owes certain duties and obligations to this country in payment for the many blessings and privileges he has enjoyed under the Stars and Stripes.

Gentlemen of this Congress, when I voted in favor of the resolution declaring war upon the Imperial German Government, I believed that the time had arrived in the history of this Nation to once again assert to all the world that the United States of America was ready to safeguard the lives and property of its citizens and that an American's life was sacred and would be protected; and the fortitude and courage that has been shown in the homes of this Nation by sending more than two and one-half million of the very bravest of our men, who are under arms at the present time, to defend our country and its people from the terrible ravages that have taken place in Belgium, France, Russia, Italy, and Poland, proves beyond a doubt that the people of this Nation are determined to preserve their liberties and our Nation's ideals of democracy.

In return for the sacrifices our men are called upon to endure the United States of America, as a matter of simple justice, owes to our crippled soldiers, in so far as medical science and education will assist, to make them as perfect and capable as they were before leaving home. These men, Mr. Chairman, have been called from every walk of life—from the factories, the great business institutions, the banks and office buildings, many from the so-called idle class, and from the farms.
